Professor Gould regrets . . .

On my right: Professor Julius Gould of Nottingham University, scourge of the Marxist and radical infiltrators in higher education; with his second, Mr Terence Miller, director of The Polytechnic of North London, and always ready to lead with his chin against the same enemy.

On my left: the PNL students' union, who have been strangely quiet of late, after the heady years when former president Terry Povey led them into conflict with Miller. Their last battle was all of two years ago, when three of their own lecturers suggested in Rape of Reason that left-wing revolutionary staff and students should be weeded out.

Centre, or thereabouts: reluctant referees, the Council for National Academic Awards. Would they stop the fight before anyone entered the ring?

Last Tuesday, by a rather embarrassing coincidence, Professor Gould had been invited to visit the accident-prone North London poly for two separate events. He was a member of a visiting party from the CNAA, whose visitations are rather more frequent than quinquennial owing to local difficulties in the sociology department, among others. He was also due to lecture, on "Freedom—for What?", at 2 pm in the poly's Ladbroke House, as part of an otherwise innocuous series arranged by the head of accounting and administrative studies.

Not unexpectedly, in view of what their president, Kate Worley (a member of the National Organization of International Socialist Societies), describes as his "very outspoken views on sociology", the students regarded both arrangements as provocative.

"I find it incredible that something like this should happen" said Kate last week, "especially since the lecture will take place a stone's throw from the sociology department."

But who would throw the first stone? Would it be a replay of the anti-Miller scenes five years ago in the Holloway Road, at about the same time when Professor H. J. Eysenck was getting beaten up for expressing unacceptable views at the London School of Economics?

The students decided to play it quietly and constitutionally at first. Their eight members on the academic board asked that both invitations should be withdrawn, and wrote to the CNAA with the same request. They got short shrift from both bodies.

They then drew up plans to picket the lecture, but not to go for all-out disruption, "though I'm sure it will get heated" said their president mildly.

Terence Miller was adopting an outwardly more belligerent line but privately hoping that the CNAA would bale him out. Having approved Gould's name on a list of visiting lecturers some time last autumn, "I'm certainly not going to write now to Professor Gould and say 'look I'm frightened of my students, you mustn't come'."

However, he admitted to some doubts when he looked at the list of the CNAA visiting party a few weeks ago, and realized that the prominent sociologist would have to rush away from the official lunch and this important visit and "shove off for an hour and a half."

"Surely he can't do both at once", he said. The two things were completely out of step. Having voiced his fears, Mr Miller was last week awaiting a call from the CNAA to say that it had been decided that Professor Gould could not do the lecture since it would interfere with the visitation.

The CNAA, however, had no intention of interfering. "I don't think we can really dictate what Professor Gould should do", said their secretary Mr B. A. T. Bleach. "I've written to the students and told them that the lecture is nothing to do with the council. We wouldn't interfere with what he's doing in a private capacity."

Over to Julius Gould at Nottingham. He wouldn't dream of pulling out of anything, and neither Mr Miller nor the CNAA had suggested that he should. "It's quite convenient to do the two things at once. I imagine that I will be given the usual hearing. That is my hope and expectation."

Mr Miller did not altogether share his hopes and expectations. "The students talked the usual sort of nonsense and hypocritical claptrap. They talk of academic freedom, then propose to stop someone speaking. Having failed at the academic board, no doubt they'll stamp up and down and clap and stop it that way.

"But I won't be bullied by my students. We're in business to discuss ideas in a civilized and courteous fashion and I don't think it was provocative to invite Professor Gould."

Mr J. L. Brown, the man who issued the invitation, wasn't so sure. "With hindsight it probably wasn't a very good idea", he admitted. Kate Worley kindly suggests that his accounting and administration department is rather remote from the mainstream of college life. He certainly seemed to be unaware of the furore over Professor's Gould blast on Marxist penetration in higher education, which was published last September, when he drew up his list of lectures in the autumn term. But early last week he began to look for an alternative speaker, just in case the CNAA stepped in.

But would the Council reconsider and intervene? Or would Julius Gould appear like a bull in front of a red rag? By the end of the week Terence Miller's nerve had cracked. He telephoned Professor Gould and asked him not to give the lecture, and later telephoned Aristides to report.

"You may say that I twisted his wrist a little, but he agreed to postpone it. We both feel very strongly that we mustn't give in to direct pressure from students, but he now agrees with me that he cant' be in two places at once."

In the old days the boys gave me apples . . .

Time to intervene

In a week when cancelled invitations have been falling as thick as snow in Somerset, news of another indefinite postponement comes from ILEA.

All members of the authority had been invited to a seminar next Monday morning on "Intervention to raise educational attainment", to be taken by Dr Michael Rutter and Professor Jack Tizard. Now another batch of notes has gone out to them all to say that the meeting has been cancelled.

Since no reason was given, speculation has been inevitable, and no one is in much doubt that it was because attainment in schools was thought to be a politically sensitive subject just before an election. There was the added anxiety that details of some of Rutter's recent research might come out.

His work on attainment, reading scores, and school organization in primary schools is well known, and he has recently turned his attention to secondary schools. The trouble is that the indicators of school output he is producing could also indicate how well a school is doing. Hardly the sort of ammunition to hand to the Tories now.

Dr Rutter's work is, in fact, subsidized by ILEA. He is highly regarded by the heads he has worked with, and he has always cooperated closely with ILEA's own research department. So it was all the more embarrassing for Dr Martin Shipman, head of the research department, to be instructed to unfix the meeting he had originally been asked to fix.

The idea had come out of a schools' sub-committee before Christmas when 15-year-old literacy scores were discussed, and the fact that scores did not change very much between the ages of nine, 11, 13 and 15. Did that mean you needed to intervene fairly early to have any chance of improving attainment? Members were interested to know whether it was best to intervene with resources at nursery school, primary or secondary stage. The sub-committee's chairman and vice-chairman, Mary-Lou Clarke and Anne Sofer accordingly went ahead and arranged the meeting.

The cancellation was never discussed in the Labour group. "More's the pity", commented one member, who had been looking forward to this rare chance to get some first-hand information on what is happening in Inner London schools.

It appears, however, that the leader, Sir Ashley Bramall, was extremely irritated when news of the seminar reached his ears. Intervention subsequently took place at authority level.

Baldwins at breakfast

The theology of sexual equality is still in its formative stage but there is little dispute that "ladies first" has been an outdated concept since the Sex Discrimination Act.

So perish the thought that it was any old-world gallantry on the part of the Head Masters Association that made them concede the presidency of the new Secondary Heads Association when they amalgamated at the beginning of the year with the Association of Head Mistresses.

Miss Mollie Blake, first president of the SHA, got the job because she was only half way through her term as president of the AHM, while Arnold Jennings had finished his at HMA. Of the people they both had in line for high office, David Williams, head of Devizes comprehensive school, is next.

After that, there will not be any question of alternating the job between men and women. It would be illegal to write in such a clause, for a start. Anyway, says Miss Blake, they would not want it, even though there are only 800 full women members to 2,300 headmasters.

"I hope we won't get gobbled up" she said, in the way that another union of women teachers (whose name she did not care to mention) had done after amalgamation. "I think we have a degree of toughness."

She presided over the first joint council of the new association last week, and somebody could not help mentioning that it really was like the first days of a marriage. Though they had been planning things together for ages, they still could not get used to thinking of themselves as one.

They have a lot to think about seriously for the future, after a year when heads have felt themselves seriously under threat—from the implications of the Taylor report, from the Janet Fookes Committee which suggested short-term contracts for heads, and the threats that they might be subje side controls on curricula staffing.

"We must be flexible," Mollie Blake, "but the ciple at issue is: 'Who what happens in schools?'

NUT leaders went along to a mons sub-committee hearing week to argue movingly for help to be given to girl leavers. They knew, of that the sub-committee's chair Mrs Renee Short, feels about the diminishing job for girls.

But someone stole Mrs car on her way to the meeting Maureen Colquhoun took chair. Knowing that Mrs Colq has even more passionate view the subject, the NUT men their stars that they were ready to say the right things.

Mrs Colquhoun, required more tangible evidence sincerity. She interrupted speeches to complain that the committee has so far seen women representing the unions suggested they should try some equality themselves. MPs hurried to back her. nesses, six members of the tives and one official, fell other trying to Colquhoun that there was plete equality for women in ranks. "Right", asked Colquhoun, "where are then?"

In fact, there was one with the NUT team—27 Kay Carberry, a graduate who works in the union's edu department. She was there to out the woman's traditional role such occasions—sitting in the her taking notes.

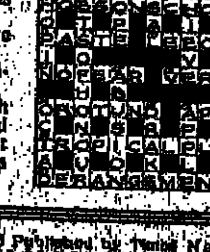
Solution to Puzzle No 1,122



Bridge

"We return", said the head of the maths department, "to that familiar nemesis, the seductive finesse. I should add, perhaps, that even then one is faced with which of two finesses to take, bridge is not merely a game of probabilities. There is such a thing as a certainty, or, as I understand it to be called in steeplechasing terms, a snip."

♠ A Q 7 6 5 — ♠ K J 10 9 8
♡ void — ♡ 9 4
♢ A K J 2 — ♢ 10 4 3
♣ [illegible] — ♣ A Q [illegible]

South leads the ace of hearts against 6 spades, and East can easily get to 11 tricks: 5 trumps, 2 heart ruffs, 3 diamonds and 1 club. Does the finesse in diamonds or in clubs offer him the better chance for his 12th? The answer, as so often, is neither.

West ruffs the opening lead, returns to hand with a trump, ruffs his second heart, and clears trumps with a second round. He now plays the A-K of diamonds, with the following consequences:

(a) the queen drops, giving him 12 tricks on top and a free club finesse for an overtrick;

(b) the queen does not drop, so he plays small to his diamond 10. If diamonds divide 3-3 with North holding the queen, the finesse would have failed anyway, and the club finesse is declarer's only chance. If diamonds divide 3-3 with South holding the queen, the finesse would have worked but would have been unnecessary. On lead after the third diamond trick, South must give a ruff and discard, or lead into the club tenace.

(c) if diamonds divide 4-2 or 5-1 in either direction, whoever wins with the queen will simply lead a fourth round, again reducing declarer to the club finesse. There is no possible distribution of defenders' diamonds whereby East can gain by finessing.

"I am happy to say", continued the mathematician, "that my familiarity with Keynes' work on probability theory did not impede my play on the following deal. I held the East cards and after a simple auction—1 spade, 2 spades, 4 spades—South led the A-K of hearts and switched to a trump.

♠ K J 9 7 — ♠ A Q 10 8 6 4
♡ [illegible] — ♡ 7 6
♢ 5 2 — ♢ A Q
♣ K J 2 — ♣ A 10 3

"As you see, there are 9 tricks on top and three possible minor suit finesses, any one of which will secure the contract, if successful. I suppose one could make some a posteriori calculations concerning the relative merits of these finesses, but I prefer not to mortgage my meagre stipend to the twitch of a nostril, the quiver of an eyebrow. The moment South led his trump to the third trick, I simply tabled my hand and claimed the contract.

"With only three trumps against me, it was a simple matter to draw them and take two heart ruffs in hand. The ace of diamonds followed, and then the queen, and whichever opponent won was obliged, king of diamonds was obliged to return either a diamond ruffed by dummy's last trump, or a club to give me three tricks in that suit. There is, on reflection, nothing quite so aesthetically satisfying as creating certainty out of doubt . . . anyone care for a game of chess?"

But the common room and the sage was left to ponder partner's sad lapse of the previous evening:

♠ Q 9 8 — ♠ A K [illegible]
♡ K Q 7 — ♡ A 2
♢ A 6 5 — ♢ 8
♣ 8 6 4 2 — ♣ A K 7 6

Playing in 6 spades, his partner (East) won the opening heart lead in hand and laid down the ace of spades. The expression on the mathematician's face was beyond my powers to describe. He was, with the ironic and imperfect consolation: just as one sometimes has to reject both of two possible finesses, so at other times one must prepare to take the same finesse twice . . .

Put away the blunderbuss

Hard on the heels of school closures caused by snow or by lack of heating all come more interruptions to children's schooling. This time it is the teachers. True, the action being taken by the NUT this week and threatened by the NAS next week in support of their pay claim does not amount to refusing to teach children, and actual school closures are only an indirect consequence. But it does amount to making life more complicated, disagreeable and exhausting for children and their families as well as for colleagues who are not taking action.

And for what? The claim is to go to arbitration anyway. So much was agreed in Burnham. Last time the teachers went to arbitration in 1975 the result was more favourable than the management side had offered. This time there is not more than about one per cent and details of distribution between what the management side were offering and what it is thought likely the teachers would accept. The arguments can be put to the arbitrators. A solution cannot be impossible. So why punish the children, some of them coming into the final straight before exams?

This sudden, bullying action seems to have a cluster of causes. There is certainly anger among the teachers at the management side's obdurate and tactless stance, the existence of which is confirmed by Sir Ashley Bramall's resignation as CLEA and Burnham spokesman. There is, too, anger that, while other categories of workers can improve their awards by more or less bogus productivity deals, there is no such scope for teachers. There is the fear that, as a phase four succeeds phase three, those without this margin for negotiation will slip progressively further behind in the pay stakes. Perhaps, too, there is a wish within the NUT to deprive the NAS of any opportunity to make the running. And then, of course, it will soon be Easter and holidays and conference time and nothing soon to be done. Mr Casey clearly wishes to use this dispute to table other grievances.

Understandable reasons, but none that justifies this sort of action. The negotiations have scarcely been protracted. If the teachers' organizations had confined their protests to strong words, Sir Ashley and the arbitrators between them would quite probably have done the job for them. As it is, they risk throwing away a fund of goodwill which has been slowly and painfully rebuilding since the dark days of the pre-Houghton and London allowance campaigns, when the teachers' cries of stinking fish did so much to create the lack of public faith in maintained secondary schooling that fuelled last year's great debate.

The best hope now is that on the teachers' side individual members and local branches of the unions will instill some sense into their leaders and that, as in Oxfordshire, where they have recent experience of the damage industrial action does to delicate relationships, teachers will not take what is, after all voluntary not mandatory action.

If at the same time the management side of Burnham can in its meetings of the next few days bring itself to take a more imaginative view, perhaps the damage to children's schooling can be confined to what has already been done.

Signpost for a broader view of the nineties

Having published its discussion document on Higher Education into the 1990s, the DES is now sitting back and waiting for the comments to flow in. It could be described as the sort of document the department ought to have published about teacher training 10 years ago—if, that is, the crystal ball had been polished up enough to see past the temporary shortage then afflicting the schools.

The crystal ball seems clearer now, but this clarity may be more apparent than real. The discussion document includes (in Appendix II) valuable statistical projections for student numbers up to 1995-96.

These projections are essential to any serious discussion, but how reliable are the assumptions on which they are based? A major assumption is the "age participation rate" (APR) which combines an estimate of the size of the qualified 18 to 19 age group and the proportion of this group seeking entry to higher education. So it involves estimates of sixth form numbers and A level successes and the range of choices open to the fragment of the age group whose academic success in secondary school or further education gives a higher education option. The best anyone can offer is a series of guesses based on past experience. And past experience shows that during the period of rapid growth in universities and colleges, APR rose rapidly (from 6.9 per cent to 14.2 per cent) before dropping back slightly to the present level of about 13.5 per cent. The demographic factor about which everyone in education is now so well aware was not the main reason for growth in the 1960s. How much importance should be placed on it now the trend is downwards?

Not sacrosanct

The DES cautiously project a slow but steady rise in the participation rate (to 18 per cent in 1994-95). This is not enough to offset the decline. But, as the DES points out, a difference of a single percentage point in the APR represents up to 31,000 students.

The projections, therefore, are not sacrosanct, but they provide the substance of the planners' scenario. Five sets of policy options are on offer. Models A, B, and C, assume that public policy should allow higher education to expand during the mid-eighties and then manage its contraction as efficiently as possible thereafter. Among the possibilities envisaged are curtailing the expansion somewhat—allowing competition for places to hot up—in order to minimise the shrinkage later on, a temporary departure from the Robbins principle of guaranteeing a place to everyone "qualified" for, and desirous of, higher education. Other ideas include such familiar runners as early retirement, redundancy, and meeting short-term needs for buildings by renting and for staff by short, fixed contracts.

These first three options reflect the pragmatic, resource based responses which have dominated the administration of teacher training over the past seven years. It is to these that administrators will turn if there are no major policy decisions to do otherwise. They will seek to minimise their later liabilities by keeping a pretty tight rein on expansion in the early 1980s, and then make the best they can of a planned reduction when numbers begin to fall.

Two more sets of choices are offered. One (Model D) is still more restrictive, involving the proliferation of two-year qualifications, more part-time courses, and the reduction of demand by making all students take a year off between school and university. This seems to be included more for symmetry than as a serious proposal. It balances what Mr Gordon Oakes has already identified as his own preferred model, Model E, which assumes that the available surplus places should be absorbed by a deliberate attempt to open up access to higher education to social classes which are at present under-represented, and by extending opportunities for older students. This, with its emphasis on continuing education, links up with ideas of recurrent education, paid educational leave and some form of grant entitlement for all mature students.

Changing threshold

As the discussion document makes clear, the ideas mooted in the separate models could be brought together in different combinations: there is nothing special about the five models as they stand. But what is interesting is the tacit acceptance throughout that admission (apart from special arrangements for mature students) will continue to be based on present entry qualifications. These are, in turn, based on A levels. But A levels are about to go into the melting pot—or so the Schools Council say. It is obviously high time that deliberations about the future of A levels and the future of higher education should be brought together.

At present about 12 per cent of the school leaving group obtains two or more A levels. It would be quite possible for examination designers to devise a sieve with a broader mesh. This should certainly be brought into the argument—together with a serious examination of proposals for broadening the range of courses comprehended within the term "higher education".

Without an examination of these issues—and the related ideas of topping up some potential university candidates with a foundation year, thus extending the first degree course to four years for some students—the built-in conservatism of the present APR calculation is obvious. The statisticians are probably right to be cautious in forecasting a rapid rise in the participation rate if the present A level format continues. The present format is appropriate to a higher education structure which is still elitist and exclusive. What is needed now is to explore the changes needed to break through to more open arrangements taking an intake equivalent to 20 or 25 per cent of the age group. This is only possible if the preliminary threshold is changed and the system is modified to welcome a broader band of the top ability.

The question which then arises is how to preserve the high standards of the best within a less restrictive system. To answer this would require the full versatility of the existing higher and further education system. It would certainly be necessary to press on with attempts to negotiate credit transfer and lend added importance to the studies now being supported by the DES, following the successful beginning made by the Council for National Academic Awards and the Open University. It might well require more flexibility between institutions than is now possible across the binary divide, and a radical examination of what this would imply for the finance and administration of both the university and non-university sectors.

It is clear that the reform of higher education—like the overhaul of arrangements for the 16 to 19 age range of which a hard look at A levels should be just a part—should be undertaken only in the light of a larger appreciation of the social and industrial environment in which young people are going to grow up. It is not enough to be content with short views and limited liabilities. Without bold policy decisions, the only thing anyone can be sure about is that higher education will stumble into the 1990s amid recrimination and retrenchment.

How can the downward spiral of racial deprivation be broken? ALAN LI believes hard cash and positive national policies offer the only answer.

Race: the centre must hol

Politicians have recognized the fact of racial disadvantage for some time, and accepted the need for positive policies. What is lacking is the translation of this rhetoric into a programme of action. Most political initiatives have concentrated on the control of immigration and elimination of discrimination, and much of the public debate reduces race relations to a numbers game.

A great deal of the rhetoric has been directed at schools. The government, in 1974, emphasized the potential contribution of schools because:

> "The education service is made responsible to assist citizens of all ages to develop their opportunities to the full, and within that responsibility there is a special obligation to children who for one reason or another are most at risk of not achieving their true potential; and second, education would be a potent instrument for increasing understanding and well-being between races."

However, little has been done by central government to turn that potential role into an educational reality. Five years ago the Select Committee on Race Relations and Immigration criticized the educational system for failing "to grasp the scale" of the issues presented by multi-racial schools. More recently a working party of chief education officers reviewing this situation concluded that:

> "Little attempt appears to have been made either to formulate a national policy in other than the most general terms or to estimate the cost of an adequate ethnic minority education programme."

Studies of local authority practices by the National Foundation for Educational Research and Community Relations Commission have documented a patchy and limited set of policies bearing little relationship to needs and Elaine Brittain has shown how far teachers have been ill-prepared for the difficulties (and opportunities) of the multi-racial classroom by their initial training.

It is a disturbing picture, especially as we are becoming far more aware of the extent of racial disadvantage. There is evidence of a gap in performance between the children of immigrant and indigenous populations, probably the equivalent of a year's reading age on transfer to secondary schools. Research in the ILEA has shown that youngsters of West Indian origin, fully educated in the United Kingdom, are performing at a lower level than pupils from unskilled working class backgrounds.

The recently publicized National Front activities in schools have merely underscored anxieties about the negative attitudes of white pupils towards blacks, summarized by David Milner. One NFER study of teachers' attitudes concluded there was large-scale stereotyping of West Indian pupils as "of low ability and creating disciplinary problems" among the profession, a view that was endorsed by the partially suppressed Schools Council project.

To this must be added social factors like the concentration of the black communities in relatively few areas, mainly in the blighted parts of some of our inner cities. The leader of the ILEA has spoken of the "severe and deepening problems" that inner city schools have to cope with:

> "Schools progressively deprived of their teachable and tractable children from stable home backgrounds have had to retain an increasing population of pupils from broken homes, one-parent families and other undesirable social conditions. To them have to be added succeeding waves of immigrants, each with their own complex of problems."

Despite these facts, central government argues that multi-racial needs can best be met through general policies for the educational disadvantaged, with limited additional funds available through Section 11 of the Local Government Act. This form of expenditure has been severely criticized by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, because it covers only staff payment, is retrospective and partial, and uses irrelevant definitions.

More fundamentally, it finances ad hoc additions to existing practices and is not part of a general strategy to tackle the special educational dimension of race relations. Given this, it is not surprising that take-up is uneven. Neighbouring authorities with similar needs have for political, administrative and professional reasons participated to different extents (Ealing, for example, claiming twice as much as Brent).

The Government decided against a special fund, arguing that decisions about how resources are used should be left to the initiative of local authorities. This argument ignores the fact that local authorities have not and sometimes cannot meet their special responsibilities created by the presence of black people on a scale commensurate with need.

'One way of judging the political commitment to eradicating racial disadvantage is by the resources created to eliminate it. On this measure we fail . . .'

The concentration of the black community in the most socially disadvantaged parts of our cities which lack the resources for extra efforts, creates the need for central government support. The evidence of school and job performance of youngsters, especially from West Indian origin, illustrates the problem. The limited provision of educational services relevant to a multi-racial community shows why action is required from the Government. The fact of racist activities in and out of school gives urgency to the need.

Only last month, the Prime Minister called for a national approach to immigration "that will avoid racialism, distortion and hatred". The case for a national approach for multi-racial education is equally compelling. The 1975 White Paper on racial discrimination said:

> 'It is the Government's duty to prevent these morally unacceptable and socially divisive inequalities from hardening into entrenched patterns. It is inconceivable that Britain in the last quarter of the twentieth century should confess herself unable to secure for a small minority of around 1,500,000 coloured citizens their full and equal rights as individual men and women.'

Home Office spokesmen have on many occasions referred to racial disadvantage. Alex Lyons (then Minister of State at the Home Office) when closing the second reading of the Race Relations bill, concluded: "There is . . . the whole area of disadvantage . . . [that is a] problem that only the Government can solve and it is their responsibility ultimately to solve it."

But this will not be solved by words alone, only by positive policies and these require commitment and resources. One way of judging the political commitment to eradicating racial disadva

Head teachers are responsible for the safety of their pupils at lunch time if the rest of the staff decide not to do playground duty. The National Association of Head Teachers has told its members that they will have to decide if they can cope with the problem or whether they should close the school during the midday break.

The dinner ban also hits at the children of poorer families who normally get free meals. They now have to take sandwiches or pay for hamburger and chips from the mobile vans which are doing a roaring trade outside school gates.

Action condemned as immoral local authorities how much they depended on teachers' goodwill and voluntary activities.

Sanctions have been introduced in more than a hundred areas by the NUT. They include withdrawal from school meals duties, refusal to collect dinner money, a ban on parent-teacher evenings and other voluntary out-of-door activities, and a refusal to use their own cars for official school business.

The NUT's action committee is urging all its 558 local associations to organize sanctions. Not all have responded and Mr Fred Jarvis, NUT general secretary, was to make a speech last night to the Oxfordshire branch explaining why they should take part.

The National Association of Schoolmasters-Union of Women Teachers has instructed all its members to "create maximum difficulty" for local authorities without breaching their contracts.

Like the NUT, the NAS-UWT has banned mid-day supervision of any kind and all tasks connected with school meals. All after-school activities, including parents' evenings and staff meetings have also been ruled out. But school journeys and sports fixtures can go ahead, the NAS-UWT said this week, provided they had been organized by teachers.

Mr Bernard Wakefield, assistant general secretary of the 102,000-strong NAS-UWT, said this week that the union's annual conference at Easter would consider further moves if there was no settlement. "A strike is not ruled out, but I don't think anyone would consider it appropriate. I'm optimistic that it will be settled before then."

Mr Terry Casey, general secretary of the NAS-UWT, has written to Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, urging her to instruct her representatives on the Burnham Committee to push for 10 per cent.

Whatever happens on Monday, it is clear that the NAS-UWT will continue to instruct its members to withdraw "goodwill" throughout the country until individual authorities agree that out-of-school activities are voluntary duties.

The union would call off the sanctions if it received unequivocal assurances that teachers were not required to undertake duties out of school hours. Guarantees along these lines have already been given by a small number of authorities.

Mr Casey said this week it was pointless to negotiate nationally on this issue because CLEA was unable to speak for all local authorities.

Mr Fred Jarvis, general secretary of the NUT, has written to the management side of Burnham pointing out that Monday's meeting could be used to make a new, improved offer. The meeting was due to be held to discuss another part of the claim—increased London allowances—but there is some confusion about whether this has to be referred to arbitration too.

Mr Jarvis said on Monday that he regretted teachers had to take action to make clear to the DES and local authorities the "intense resentment which their unwillingness to negotiate in Burnham has aroused".

"A sign of goodwill from the employers in the form of a readiness to negotiate on a fairer and more realistic offer could even now bring a speedy end to the action we have launched."

The effect of the sanctions is already being felt in areas like Newcastle upon Tyne where thousands of pupils were given the week off school. Seven comprehensives were closed on Monday and others sent children home at lunchtime because the authority said it could not guarantee their safety while staff refused to carry out supervision.

The third largest union, the Assistant Masters' Association, announced this week that it would not join the sanctions, but will tell its members not to "blackleg". Although the association thinks it is unprofessional to take industrial action when the issue has been referred to arbitration, it believes that its 40,000 members should not undertake any extra work or duties.

Mr Andrew Hutchings, AMA general secretary, said the arbitrators had to come to an independent and objective assessment. "I have sufficient confidence in the strength of the teachers' case to think that the arbitrators will do this", Mr Hutchings said.

He added that it would be better if the sanctions did not go on. "I wish they had never started. I would prefer them not to go on with this."

The Professional Association of Teachers, which is pledged never to go on strike, said the sanctions were "totally immoral". Mr Ian Lambert, PAT spokesman, said the association would advise its members to continue to help with school meal supervision.

The Association of Assistant Mistresses has also advised its 39,000 members not to take part in sanctions, but if they do wish to relinquish any of their voluntary duties they should make clear that it is not part of a campaign. Miss Sheila Wood, AAM general secretary, has written to her members asking them to contact local councillors and MPs to put the case for a bigger rise.

The National Association of Head Teachers has told its members that it would be unwise to accept offers of help from parents during lunch hours. Experience had shown that this could cause grave damage to relationships in school, said Mr David Hart, general secretary elect of the NAHT.

Mr Frank Mills, the association's president, has written to Mrs Shirley Williams offering his services as a peacemaker. He said he was ready to act as an "honest broker in any initiative to bring this very damaging situation in the schools, to an acceptable conclusion".

Employers' united front falls apart

A split within the ranks of local authorities — the employers—which was revealed at the start of the week with the resignation of Sir Ashley Bramall as their chief negotiator, has widened to a chasm.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities was due to meet yesterday to discuss the growing revolt as increasing numbers of authorities stepped out of line and announced that teachers should get a full 10 per cent rise.

The split was exposed by Sir Ashley's resignation as leader of the management panel of the Burnham Committee and hcairman of the Council of Local Education Autho-

Sir Ashley, who is also leader of the Inner London Education Authority, said he could no longer act as the spokesman and principal negotiator.

"I am increasingly conscious that my views are out of step with the majority of those for whom I have to speak, whose view of negotiation often seems to be confined to say 'no' to everything."

Sir Ashley said he agreed with the Government's 10 per cent pay guidelines but it is clear that he thinks a higher offer could have been made.

He is also angry that he was not consulted about letters sent to the teacher unions by the Association of County Councils and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities which condemned the industrial action.

Local authorities in Leeds, Sandwell and Wolverhampton support a 10 per cent offer. Lancashire, Leicestershire and Walsall have issued more general statements of support.

The division within the management panel of Burnham appears to have been caused by the intransigence of the county councils who are insisting that the guidelines will be breached if deductions are not made from a 10 per cent offer to pay for "salary drift", the cost of increments and promoted posts.

Are literature and politics compatible? Or does the quality of literature deteriorate the more it attempts to influence the political persuasions of the reader? These questions and many more are discussed in this series with close reference to the best-known European writers of this century.

Redbridge go for selection showdown

by Patricia Rowan and Bob Doe

Redbridge is all set to be the next local education authority to follow Tameside into the courts in a conflict with the Government over its policy on comprehensives.

Mrs Shirley Williams, the Education Secretary, has written to the London borough to say she wants firm plans for the elimination of selection by the end of this month. On March 22, a meeting of the full Redbridge Council is expected to endorse an education committee decision not to submit plans.

The Redbridge line, as explained by Mr John Telford, chairman of its education committee, is that since 92 per cent of the secondary school children in the borough are now in comprehensive schools, they have given "due regard to the principle of comprehensive reorganization".

They want to leave their two remaining grammar schools—which they now prefer to call academic centres—as they are for another year or two ,until they see how the rest of the recent reorganization is working out.

Mrs Williams, however, is not happy about leaving Woodford County Girls High and Ilford County Boys High with a higly selective intake for the next year or two. "She wrote us a rather stiff letter", said Mr Telford.

He expects her to follow up their refusal to produce plans on March 31 by invoking Section 99 of the 1944 dEucation Act, on the grounds thatu the lea has failed to discharge a duty imposed upon it by the Minister, and to apply to the court for a writ of mandamus in support.

Mr Telford would welcome the chance for Redbridge to argue its case in court, but if the decision goes against it, he believes it should not break the law or go to appeal.

He has in mind that any court declaration is likely to be six to nine months away, and that any subsequent plans and consultation would take the issue beyond the latest possible date for a general election in autumn, 1979.

Mr Norman St John-Stevas and Dr Rhodes Boyson, the Opposition education spokesmen, have both promised that a Conservative government would be quick to repeal the 1976 Education Act (which effectively outlawed selection).

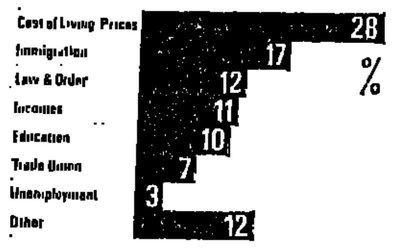
Even before the general election, however, there is the question of just how far the fate of the grammar schools might be a vote-winning issue in marginal constituencies.

There is some evidence that it did play such a role in last week's by-election in Ilford North, one of the three parliamentary constituencies which make up Redbridge.

The original adamant decisions by the reorganization sub-committee and the education committee not to produce plans to end selection were reached at the end of February, just as nomination day was approaching in Ilford North. Not a good time, as local Conservatives were kuick to point out, for the Education Secretary to be seen to be hounding the local authority on an issue on which there was strong local feeling.

The Conservative candidate, Mr Vivian Bendall, did indeed get a number of questions reflecting concern about the fate of the grammar schools, and at least one poll was one of the factors which helped him to win the seat.

The policies that attracted voters.



Ilford North opinion poll. © ITN-ORC.

Independent Television News and Opinion Research Centre asked a sample of voters, as they came out of the polling stations, how they had voted, and whether they had switched votes since 1974. They were also asked which policies had influenced thtm. Education came fifth, with 10 per cent.

Among those who switched votes from Labour to Conservative, education ranked third, behind only the cost of living and immigration.

In a sample of only 635 the numbers were small, of course, but ITN-ORC claim that their results overall were within 2 per cent of the final declaration. Anyway, small numbers are what count in marginal constituencies.

All the other six authorities which have been reluctant to submit comprehensive plans to the Secretary of State have now either done so or agreed to do so. But several are trying to spin out discussions or postpone implementation as long as possible in the hope that a Conservative government will let them off the hook.

Buckinghamshire has submitted proposals for 11 to 16 schools and some 11 to 18 "academic centres" based on existing grammar schools although it has already been told by the DES that these are not acceptable. They were submitted, reluctantly to comply with the law. In any event, the county does not expect to put plans into operation until 1983.

Sutton planned to end selection in 1984 though the DES stipulated 1980 and warned the Outer London borough this week that legal action could be taken against it if it did not make a start this year. Sutton's legal advice, however, is that such action would be unsuccessful.

Trafford too, has sought legal opinion on whether the Secretary of State's insistence on its scheme operating from 1980 instead of 1981 is a reasonable exercise of her powers.

Bexley agreed to draw up new plans after its first, costed at £9m and spreading over 10 years, were rejected. This will take until after June, it says. Kingston have been told to reorganize by 1979 rather than 1982.

Tameside's plans, which allow for an end to selection in 1981, have been submitted, and the DES has asked for more information about extra buildings envisaged.

Parable of the good lunatic

A parable for Lent. A man was travelling from Pimlico to Westminster when he fell among muggers, who beat him and stripped him of his credit cards and left him for dead. It started to rain.

There came that way a bishop clothed in purple who when he saw the man lying on the pavement said to his chauffeur: "Draw up here, Jenkins, but keep the engine running. I'm already late for the conference on world poverty." He lowered the window just far enough to put out his hand and, making the sign of the Cross, he said: "In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. Drive on Jenkins." And he passed by on the other side.

There came that way a member of the International Marxist Group who, when he saw the man, said: "I embrace you—metaphorically of course—as a fellow victim of the capitalist system. With any luck you'll die. The heroic struggle of the workers needs a martyr or two." And he passed by on the other side.

There came that way a philosopher from the University of Oxford who, when he saw the man, said: "Though it is true that the evidence of my eyes suggests that there is a man lying on the pavement, it is not a logical step to conclude that because he is lying on the pavement he is in need of my help. On the contrary the fact that he has been immobile for several minutes suggests that he may be beyond any help I could give even if I decided to give it."

"Even if he is alive (whatever that may mean) it is by no means certain that he would welcome my help; he might have chosen to lie on the pavement in which case he would regard any action of mine as an unwarranted interference with his free will as expressed in his decision to lie on pavements." And he passed by on the other side.

There came that way a member of the Government who, when he saw the man, said: "This is a problem we inherited when we came to office. We are already taking the most strenuous measures to deal with it. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that you will be one of the last people left to die on the pavement." And he passed by on the other side.

There came that way a member of the Opposition. When he saw the man he said: "This is a direct result of the present Government's policies, I give a most solemn promise that when my party is returned to power people like you will not be allowed to die on the pavement." And he passed by on the other side.

There came that way the Headmaster of a nearby public school who, when he saw the body lying on the pavement, said to himself: "Oh dear, I hope he's not one of ours." And he hurried by on the other side.

There came that way a pop star in his powder-blue Rolls-Royce who, when he saw the man, called out to him from the moving car saying: "I identify myself with the oppressed in all the world. I love you man, I love your face, I love the whole goddam stupid human race." And he drove by on the other side.

Finally, there came that way a lunatic who had recently escaped from an asylum. He was incapable of logical thought. He understood no politics, possessed no ideals, performed no civic duty, held no position in the world, paid no taxes and gave no alms. He had the mind of a child. His family had secretly hoped that he would not survive until manhood because they found the burden of his abnormality too hard to bear.

When he saw the man lying on the pavement he went up to him and lifted him, body, blood and dust, and carried him in his arms to the nearest hospital. On his way he passed a bus queue. The men and women standing in the queue, when they saw the lunatic carrying a man in his arms, set their faces unswervingly towards the oncoming bus. "We're lucky with the weather", said one, though her face was filled with rain. "Can't complain, can we?" said another.

The lunatic arrived at the hospital. He carried his burden into outpatients and laid it on a table. A doctor examined the man and said: "This man is dead. Who brought him here?"

"I", said the lunatic.

"You must be mad", said the doctor.

And they laid hands on the lunatic and thrust him into an asylum.

And he said unto them: "Which of these was the friend to the man who fell among muggers?"

And they replied: "He who was mad."

And he said unto them: "Go and be mad for my sake. Your insanity will make you whole."

ILEA starts new cane probe

Having abolished caning in primary schools five years ago, the Labour majority on the Inner London Education Authority'se education committee are now trying to stop it in secondary schools.

On Tuesday they threw out a Conservative motion which sought to confirm the right of heads to use corporal punishment at their discretion and accepted, instead, an amendment from Sir Ashley Bramall, leader of the ILEA, which called for consultations with teacher associations with a view to ending this form of punishment.

The authority had other proposals for dealing with disruptive pupils, said Sir Ashley, a reference to the withdrawal centres in each school on which the authority intends to spend £1m this year.

The full amendment which the committee accepted by 32 to 19 votes was: "that the committee while recognizing the present right of heads to use corporal punishment at their own discretion within the terms of the authority's regulations, expresses the hope that the Authority's proposals for dealing with disruptive pupils and consultations with teacher associations will lead to the elimination of this form of punishment".

At the request of Sir Ashley, a survey is being conducted into the extent of caning in Inner London schools. Dr Michael Birchenough, chief inspector, who is to conduct the survey, said this week that it would start in the summer term.

Mr Robert Vigars, leader of the Conservatives, said afterwards that ideally there would be no punishment. But it was not realistic at the present time to do away with the cane.

footsteps," the inspectors say. They saw "much work of creditable quality particularly in literateure, mathematics and science."

The school record system is "excellent". Corporal punishment and detention are banned. Instead, pupils are put o report or are set to do useful jobs. The trust of the school in this philosophy has evidenly not been misplaced, the report says. "HMI were impressed by the generally excellent behaviour of the school."

They were also impressed by the "quality of application to work shown by pupils at all stages". Few pupils could be found who had lost interest.

Although it would be inaccurate to suggest that the school has none of the usual disciplinary problems, these are contained by the corporate discipline of the centre and are seldom apparent. "With a very few exceptions, the pupils are pleased to belong to this school, enjoy working in it and behave accordingly."

The buildings show little sign of wear and tear. "It is rare to find a school which has been open as long as the centre in which the premises still retain their freshness of appearance. There is not only an absence of any serious signs of vandalism, there is less evidence of wear and tear than might have been expected, although the premises are heavily used throughout the day and the evening."

There is a note of caution. The inspectors suggest that the teachers may be working too hard. The staff have given up most of their free periods to obtain smaller teaching groups and have little or no time for marking, preparation or administration during the school day.

But the school is said to represent a "notable experiment in education".

Mrs Williams said this week that she was glad the report showed there was no need for any serious disquiet. A full report, which suggests ways of improving some aspects of the school's work, is being sent to the governors and teachers.

● The local branch of the National Union of Teachers has withdrawn from a dispute with the county council over the county's own inquiry into the school after receiving assurances, and the dispute has been called off.

25% of leavers can't do the simplest sums

A quarter of all school leavers cannot do simple arithmetic like six times 79, 79.3 minus 8.1, and 13.5 plus five according to a recent survey of 8,000 such pupils.

The Institute of Mathematics, the body that represents all professional mathematicians, has tested the basic numeracy of fifth formers in Buckinghamshire, Dyfed, Essex, Leeds and London. They also tested fourth years in Cleveland.

The results from every authority were so unsatisfactory, the Institute says, that it does not even feel the need to comment on them.

The test was concerned with only the most basic skills that ought to be well within the capabilities of almost all pupils about to complete their compulsory schooling, the IMA says. A mark of 80 per cent on such a test is far below the acceptable minimum standard.

Only just over a third of the pupils tested achieved that level, with girls and the Cleveland fourth formers doing particularly badly. Only just over a third got the first six simple arithmetic questions (like those above) correct.

Pupils in the Inner London Education Authority did particularly badly too, Only 32 per cent of the boys and 21 per cent of the girls got over 80 per cent compared to well over half in Buckinghamshire. Only 16 per cent of the ILEA boys and 9 per cent of the girls got over 90 per cent compared with 40 and 35 per cent respectively in Buckinghamshire.

Over a third of the students in every authority got wrong answers to the questions on simple percentages, and in many cases over a half did. About a half of all pupils could not express 40 per cent as a decimal. Just under a half could not say how much a £15 pair of jeans reduced by 20 per cent would cost.

Between a quarter and a half of the pupils could not write out £149.09 correctly in figures.

Full marks were obtained by 8.3 per cent of the fifth-form boys and 4.5 per cent of the girls.

'Panic won't help'

Merely teaching children how to do sums is not good enough, according to a policy document issued by the Joint Mathematical Council.

Traditional computational skills should not be equated with numeracy, it says. Much more than arithmetic is needed. "Pupils must also know which computation is appropriate to the problem in hand."

The council calls for "balanced and realistic" targets. The common assumption that nearly all children can do long multiplication and division was never true. "The aim in mathematics teaching should be to give all children the satisfaction of doing some things really well."

Panic measures, the council says, will not help in the mathematical education of the whole community.

300 student teachers in DES training probe

by Bert Lodge

Student teachers will play a major role in an important research project into in-service training to be launched in September. The programme will start with three training institutions, 20 schools. 40 teachers and 300 students in training, and is expected to treble in size by 1980.

Financed by the Department of Education and Science, the project aims to develop a national pattern of school-focused in-service traing (INSET). It will be directed by Professor John Merritt and Dr Euan Henderson of the Open University and Mr Derek Mortimer of Central London Polytechnic.

The first three training institutions involved will be Charlotte Mason College in Cumbria, Middlesex Polytechnica and Sheffield Polytechnic with up to 100 students from each taking part. They will cooperate with 40 teachers, two from each of 20 primary and secondary schools.

The project directors envisage a team in each school which may vary in size but is likely to consist of two of the schools classroom teachers, five student teachers and a tutor from the training institution.

Three further collegse will send members of their staffs as observers during the first year of the project. They will return to star' a similar programme based on their own colleges in September, 1979, which will, in turn, be observed by staff from a fresh trio of colleges. By September, 1980, it is hoped that another six training institutions will have entered the project.

Dr Henderson said this week that teachers taking part would in effect be enrolled on a part-time school-based course leading to a recognized award.

In a written outline of the project the directors say teachers will gain credit for identifying and examining the problems relating to their own teaching situation and will later be encouraged to evaluate the whole curriculum in a systematic way.

The students in initial training will spend at least one day a week during the greater part of their course in the same school as a part of the school team. Each student will take responsibility for some aspect of curriculum evaluation.

"Students will, therefore, be engaged in what might be called a constructive apprenticeship. On the one hand, they will be acting as assistants to the in-service teachers. . . . On the other hand they will also be reaching, first small groups and later the whole class."

Reasons for the choice of three colleges to launch the project become apparent in the document. "Our view is that the classroom teacher is rather like an engineer who has to start with all the problems that present themselves in each new situation and devise appropriate solutions. A few training institutions in the UK have in recent years begun to move towards this view. . . . Our three pilot institutions have deliberately been chosen from those whose staffs are well advanced along this path."

● Four schools will take part in another major research project into school-focused INSET to be financed by the DES.

Supervised by Dr Ray Bolam, of Bristol University School of Education, it will look at the effectiveness of in-service training in two secondary schools, one urban and one rural, and one each of their feeder primary schools. St George's comprehensive, Bristol, with Easton primary, and Devizes comprehensive with Wansdyke primary, are the schools taking part. Director of the project, which will last two and a half years and cost £30,000, is Mr Keith Baker, also of Bristol University School of Education.

NUT seeks 20pc rise in fees

The National Union of Teachers publicly announced its biggest ever membership last week while privately circulating a document calling for a 20 per cent increase in members' fees.

The total in-service membership of the union has gone up from 236,204 at the end of 1976 to 245,675 at the end of 1977. Retired and "left profession" members bring the total to 264,386.

Despite this increase and the consequent rise in income, however, the union executive wants to increase the annual subscriptions by 20 per cent next year to avoid lossees of more than £500,000.

A confidential memorandum on subscriptions, which will be presented for approval to a private session of the union's annual conference in Blackpool at the end of this month, says that if the increase doese not go through, the union will be in the red from the end of this year.

A deficit of £83,000 is expected in spite of tight control of union spending. The union plans to spend £2.59m in 1978 and expects to take in £2.51m. The shortfall will be made up by dipping into its reserves of just over £1m. The strike fund of about £4m will not be touched.

The union executive believes that an increase in membership is unlikely in the future and that the 1978 budget should be based on no increase in subscription income.

Last year's annual conference turned down a request from the executive for an 8 per cent rise in subscriptions. The current fee is £12 a year.

Apart from inflation, the major increases in the unions' spending during the next few years will arise from expansion of regional offices and the setting up of a research department at the London headquarters.

But the biggest new item in the budget is Stoke Rochford Hall, the former Kesteven College of Education, which has been bought by the union as a residential training centre.

The estimated capital commitment is £340,000. Running costs for the rest of this year are estimated at £83,500 and £131,000 in a full year after taking account of income from lettings to other organizations.

The 20 per cent rise in subscriptions would offset this increase in spending to a large extent, but it would not be enough to meet all the union's planned commitments for 1979. The executive proposes, therefore, to supplement its income next year by drawing on reserves, if necessary.

An increase of less than 20 per cent would put the reserves in jeopardy and force the union to borrow money in the early part of 1980.

Students shun racial bias

Student teachers are strongly opposed to positive discrimination in favour of entry by racial minorities to higher education, a survey at a polytechnic indicates. Of 126 students in the department of education, 97 opposed the idea, 19 were in favour and 10 had no views.

Graduates at the polytechnic (which asked to remain anonymous) were more opposed than BEd students, 82 per cent compared with 77 per cent. The biggest group in favour of positive discrimination was male BEd students with female BEd students least in favour.

Concern for standards was the most popular reason for rejecting the proposal. This accounted for 41 per cent of objections. The injustice of the idea was unacceptable to 22 per cent, and 17 per cent opposed it because of the conflict it could provoke.

Of the six students from racial minority groups who took part in the survey, four opposed differential selection.

Britain's 44 universities will reject any attempt to breach the established principle that if teenagers are qualified and willing to go to university, places should be available for them. They will also reject any move on the future of higher education that involves further financial restrictions.

These warnings, said Lord Boyle, chairman of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, and a former Conservative education minister, last week, were the committee's first reactions to the Government's discussion document Higher Education into The 1990s.

The aim of the document is to formulate by next year a new policy for the development of higher education to meet the known bulge in numbers up to the mid-1980s and a decline to the present level by the early 1990s because of the falling birthrate.

Management bid for more say

Decisions taken by the British Institute of Management at its annual conference in London this week may lead to new pressures on universities and colleges to broaden their approach to technological education.

The institute, once the country's foremost management training body, called unanimously for

- A three-year action programme to coordinate management and educational institutions and to achieve "an effective dialogue" at all levels.
- A review of the grade of membership available to students.

Powerful figures in the institute, including its chairman, Sir Derek Ezra, head of the National Coal Board, and Mr Peter Parker, chairman of British Rail, want technological courses to include an adequate management education.

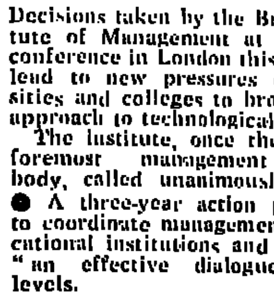
Engineers and technologists, they argue, are just as likely as professional administrators to have to carry important managerial responsibilities. A colliery manager, says Sir Derek, may be responsible for the operation of £500m worth of plant.

Mr Parker told the conference he was worried about the unrealistic separation between business and technical education. "We have got to reexamine the position. Business education is not something to be stuck on like an outboard motor to technical training."

The institute's leaders are surprised and encouraged by the upsurge of interest in education among members, for the first time for many years. More than 20 years ago, the institute, which had pioneered management education, decided to drop its role as an examining body to leave a clear field for the new diplomas in management studies which it had encouraged the universities and colleges to offer.

In effect, it opted out of active competition with the teaching institutions in return for a new and powerful behind-the-scenes influence. With its own training programmes greatly reduced, there was little to hold members' interest in education.

This week's debate, however, attracted more interest than anything else on the agenda. Most of the questions and exhortations were those which have become familiar in the past 18 months . . . ensure proper teaching of basic skills . . . better careers guidance . . . prepare leavers for the realities of working life . . . build links between industry and schools . . . act to ensure that industry attracts able people . . . second teachers to industry. . . .



School to work

by Mark Jackson

Dr Denis Ashby, chairman of the Institution of Works Manager's education committee, said they believed credible management education programmes could only come from professional institutions, industrialists, and academics working together. He suggested a new United Kingdom Management Education Council headed by the institute and his own institution.

Management required school leavers to be numerate and literate. "Management centres are not the correct places to carry out remedial teaching", he said.

Mr Colin Peacocke, a former manager now in teaching, suggested that the great debate was based on a false premise. Managers had failed to restructure jobs to match the strata of ability from which it was drawing recruits in place of the more able who were staying on to get higher qualifications.

"Stop crying", he said, "about those who come out of school without being able to read and recognise that it is your fault that you have not altered the job to make it easier".

Project to fund new broadcasting training study

The Manpower Services Commission, the BBC, the Independent Broadcasting Authority and the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation are to provide funds for an inquiry into the possible role of broadcasting in the education and training of young adults. The study will be especially concerned with the problems of the unemployed and disadvantaged.

The project team also intends to guidance of Mr David Moore, principal of Nelson and Colne College of Further Education. The chairman of the steering committee will be Mr Peter Brinson, director of the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation.

The project team also intends to commission research from a variety of organizations to discover the attitudes of young people, parents, teachers and potential employers to the possible role of broadcasting.

A report will be published at the end of June.

Task force formed

Avon County Action Committee on Unemployment is to set up a task force of 18 unemployed teachers, based in the education department's day centres, to give advice and help to unemployed young people. Over 3,000 young people under 19 in to unemployed young people. Over the number will soon be swelled by a new batch of Easter leavers.

Why are so many Welsh children fed up with school? In North Wales today, the principality that holds education in such high esteem is asked why its schools apparently offer so little to the less academic Bob Doe reports

How grey is my valley

Truancy in Wales is worse than in any region of England, including London. At the same time the proportion of children leaving Welsh schools with no GCE or CSE qualifications is 60 per cent greater than in England.

These are symptoms of the aimlessness and apathy of many Welsh schoolchildren, and of the apparent failure of some of their comprehensives to shake off their grammar school, sink-or-swim approach.

The shortcomings of the system are due to be discussed today at a special conference called by the Welsh Office in the North Wales town of Mold.

The Welsh Education Office points to economic and social reasons for the poor record. It says too that the Welsh examination board's policies are partly to blame and that a contributory factor is the low status of CSE and the concentration on O level results.

Wales compares favourably with England in terms of the numbers of school leavers with five O levels or A levels. But, says the Welsh Office discussion paper for the conference, the secondary curriculum of Welsh schools is too academic for the middle and lower ability groups; these pupils need something to make their school lives more purposeful and stimulating.

Welsh HMIs are even more critical of the way their comprehensives concentrate on grammar school streams. They talk of complacency among teachers about the low expectations of some pupils.

Few schools make any special efforts to help the underachievers. Instead, HMIs say, they are offered a monotonous, restricted, repetitive and inadequate learning diet. Those who cannot cope with academic work are virtually left to sink or swim.

Such pupils are often found by inspectors mindlessly copying out passages from books they cannot understand, or wasting time on elaborate illustrations for their "humanities projects".

Underachievement in basic literacy and numeracy in Wales is "a disturbingly substantial problem" inspectors say—although they admit there is no evidence that it is worse than in England.

Language lessons are often artificial and irrelevant to those who have rejected the academic ladder. Maths exercises are too often mechanical and routine, no attempt being made to ensure pupils understand what they are doing or to relate maths to the real world.

The children about whom most concern is being expressed are not the least able. The Welsh Office report says the disparity between achievements in Wales and England starts at around the one O level mark, and manifests itself particularly in poorer attainments at CSE.

In 1976 17 per cent of English school leavers had no CSE or GCE. In Wales that year the figure was 27 per cent. Both figures include some children incapable of getting any such certificates, but the suggestion is that in Wales there are substantial numbers who could have got them.

As one education welfare officer put it, the group at risk are those who are not quite up to O levels, but who are bright enough to see that one or two CSEs of doubtful usefulness are not going to significantly enhance employment prospects. These are the bored, disaffected and alienated children he finds himself dealing with.

The popular explanation for the existence of these pupils in large numbers is that they are the fall-out from the extreme regard for academic achievement that exists in Wales. The attitude pervades home, school and local authority alike. At one time, for instance, almost 40 per cent of children in the Rhondda attended grammar schools.

It is more than a mere tradition. Limited job prospects have made it an imperative. For years education has been seen as the means of avoiding a life down the mines, of getting on or getting out. It explains in part the large numbers of expatriate Welsh teachers.

What jobs there are tend to be for qualified staff in the administrative offices, like Swansea's Vehicle Licensing Centre at Swansea, so often relocated to the region. The populous South Wales strip has become what one employment officer called one of the nation's filing cabinets. It has little to offer the unskilled.

Another feature of Welsh education is the single examination board for both CSE and GCE, the Welsh Joint Education Committee. The Welsh Office report says the WJEC policy of holding the two exams concurrently prevents any double entry of borderline cases, encouraging all-or-nothing bids for O level. Holding CSE exams after the summer school leaving date also means more pupils leave without taking exams.

But sterner critics say the WJEC is more culpable for the low uptake of CSE. Education advisers in one South Wales authority point out that unlike any English CSE board which has to make its wares attractive in order to survive, CSE has always

Malvern in apartheid row

Rugby School has said no to playing a touring cricket team from the whites-only St Andrew's College, Grahamstown, South Africa, but Malvern College has agreed, a decision which has been condemned by Mr Peter Hain, the anti-apartheid campaigner.

Both schools consulted staff and pupils. At Rugby, the head, Mr James Woodhouse, found such strong opposition to apartheid that he rejected the Grahamstown request for a match in June on the famous playing fields.

There was powerful opposition to apartheid at Malvern, too, but 53 per cent of the 600 boys and 60 teachers favoured a match with St Andrew's; 37 per cent were against, with 10 per cent don't knows.

Mr Woodhouse said he

by Bob Doe

Her Majesty's Inspectors are worried about the interdisciplinary European studies courses now springing up in secondary schools. These courses are often seen as an alternative to foreign language teaching for the less able.

Many were "botched up jobs" said Mr Roy Wake, the Staff Inspector for Secondary Education. European studies should not be isolated from language learning, and he rejected the idea that the less able somehow needed more European education.

"European studies at their best are interdisciplinary. They must not be just a second best, while the rest get on with pure history, geography and languages", Mr Wake said.

The concern of the Department of Education and Science and of HMIs over European studies goes back some way. A survey carried out by the inspectorate four years ago was said to have revealed such a poor state of affairs that it was ruled too depressing for publication.

A DES conference held in Bruges in 1976 identified many of the difficulties involved in Europeanizing the curriculum, and concluded that a specific European studies course was not always the best way of doing it. Britain was the only country in which such courses existed and a broader European content across the whole curriculum might be a better approach, it was decided.

The conference highlighted the narrowness of many European studies courses. Often the EEC countries or even just France and Germany were treated as synonymous with Europe. The courses also tended to ignore European science, technology, industry and politics.

Linguists at the conference were split over whether a language component should be included in such courses, and teachers were handicapped by the lack of suitable textbooks and materials.

HMIs have kept in touch with those involved in the Bruges conference, but have since seen little progress.

Yet knowledge of Europe was "part of the indispensable curriculum that every child has a right to up to the age of 16", said Mr Wake, who is in charge of the HMI's attempt to get 41 schools in five local authorities to work out a new rationale for the secondary curriculum.

But the DES clearly believes that the number of degrees and diplomas in European studies offered by colleges and universities has reached saturation point, and that these are not much use in helping students find a job. Any further proposals for such courses would not be taken up, said Mr Wake, because there were enough already.

TES travel offer

The Times Educational Supplement is arranging, with Lunn Poly and Air India, a 14-day tour of North-West India for teachers. The main tourist attractions—Delhi's antiquities, the Taj Mahal, the pink city of Jaipur—will of course be included, but the tour will also involve much that is of specific interest to TES readers: visits to a village school and to Delhi university, and informal meetings with local teachers and students. The tour will begin on July 23. See next week's TES for full details.

Prison courses unproductive

Prisoners are only marginally affected by education behind bars, a report from the National Association for the Care and Rehabilitation of Offenders suggests. They, in many cases, take up courses and tasks which have little relevance to later life.

Tough men make soft toys by the thousand, an activity they are unlikely to pursue when released, say the authors, E. C. and N. I. Hodgkin. "Similarly, the fact that they work for their O levels in Spanish, art, or forestry should not be taken as an indication that they think these subjects are going to be useful to them in their subsequent careers, whether these are in legitimate or illegitimate fields".

The pamphlet, which is a report of NACRO's recent European conference, adds that some prisoners can see some genuine use in education. When considering what kind of education a prisoner needs the most important factor is hsi or her age.

For children and teenagers the aim must be to prevent them being sucked into the circuit of remand centres, borstals and prisons. The report describes three projects which achieve this—the Hammersmith Teenage, the Bristol New Careers and the Cambridge Education projects.

EEC rivals set to forge fighting link

Teachers throughout Europe could soon be in a position to wield powerful influence on the education policy of the Common Market now that determined attempts are being made to end the split between the two European groups of teacher unions which has prevented either from being heard in Brussels.

The two leading British teacher unions are each affiliated to the rival groups. The National Union of Teachers belongs to the World Confederation of Organizations of the Teaching Profession (WCOTP), while the National Association of Schoolmasters-Union of Women Teachers has joined the European Teachers' Trade Union Committee (ETTUC).

Neither grouping was prepared to accept the other's claim to represent the voice of teachers in talks with the EEC commission.

But now there is a chance of the two bodies acting jointly to form a new organization which would be recognized by the European Trades Union Confederation as its "industry committee" for teachers.

This emerged last week after a meeting between representatives of WCOTP and ETTUC. Mr Fred Jarvis, general secretary of the NUT and a member of the European TUC, who was present at the meeting, said the change of attitude was very welcome.

Welsh truant study

The Welsh Office is to spend more than £100,000 on research into classroom behaviour and truancy.

During the next four years Cardiff University researchers will investigate an in-service course for teachers dealing with disruptive, truanting and low achieving pupils.

A second project, also at University College, Cardiff, will look at the way comprehensive schools in South East Wales influence the social and educational development of their pupils.

Are your classes still having trou blew ithwo rdscom prehension?

An understanding of words — their structure and meaning — is probably one of the most basic and necessary skills that a child has to develop. Now, with the introduction of the latest kit in their highly-respected Schoolhouse series, SRA offer a flexible teaching aid that turns the spotlight on this potential problem area. New 'Schoolhouse Word Attack IC' has 200 re-usable exercise cards (2 copies of each) that cover in depth the four basic areas of Structural Analysis, Syllables, Word Meanings and Dictionary Skills.

But there's more! SRA kits are renowned for giving teachers total flexibility with their carefully structured and graded materials that allow children to develop at their own pace, as well as monitor their own performance. And Word Attack IC is no exception. Two channels, Phonics A and Phonics B, let the brighter child work on at a fast pace whilst still giving valuable, more slowly paced, reinforcement programmes for the slower child.

Word Attack IC is a valuable teaching aid in it's own right, but if your school is already using our other Schoolhouse Word Attack Kit then it becomes almost a necessity. Write or phone us for full details. We are sure youw-illbeg lady oudid!

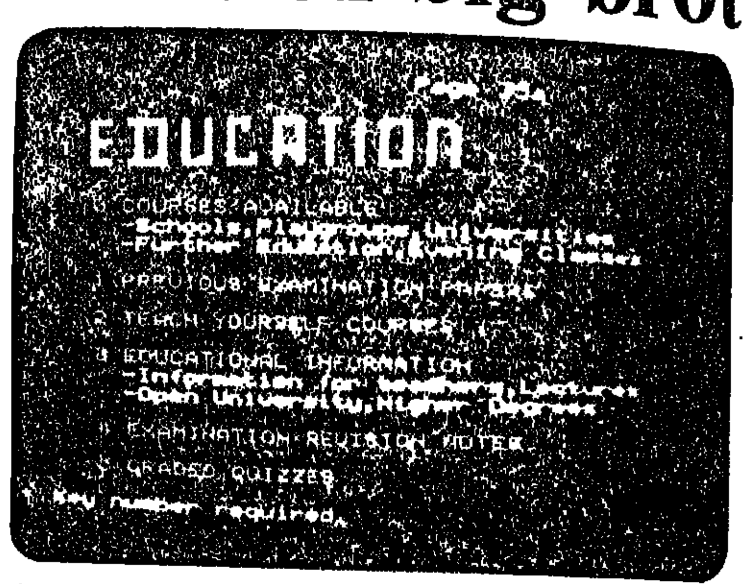
Learn with big broth



A brave new educational world which will turn domestic television sets into teaching machines, give parents an education advice service, revolutionize careers offices, and bring teachers an almost limitless supply of up-to-the-moment information of exams, curriculum developments, and teaching aids is likely to be well on the way to reality by 1984.

This follows last week's decision b
Office to bring forward to next yea of Viewdata, the futuristic system television sets via the telephone to computers.

Philip Venn

Viewdata is one of three systems which use television screens to bring pages of printed information to homes, offices, and institutions such as schools. The other two systems, Ceefax developed by the BBC, and Oracle developed by ITV, are similar to Viewdata though more limited in their use.

The information Viewdata provides will depend solely on which organizations are prepared to pay £250 a year plus £1 for every "page" of screen text they want to reserve a year.

From the start the Post Office assumed that education would be one of the main users along with companies offering financial information such as stock market prices, sports results, and welfare services. Already a number of educational organizations such as the Universities Central Council on Admissions, the careers publishers, the New Opportunities Press, and the Open University have booked "pages" for a trial run which starts this June in Birmingham and parts of London and East Anglia.

To use Viewdata the school or person needs to be on the telephone and needs to buy or hire a specially modified colour television set. The operator can then summon up the computer with a local telephone call and select the page he wants on his screen. When the public service starts next year the computer will have a capacity of 250,000 different pages of information. Some pages will be available free of charge; others will be charged to the user's telephone bill every time he looks at them. The policy on charges will be decided by the organization offering the information. Public service organizations, such as Government departments, are much less likely to charge than commercial organizations out to make a profit.

The Post Office sees the present system as a building block on which much more elaborate technical devices can be based. One of the first developments expected is an arrangement allowing the user to reply to the computer which is not possible with the other two teletext systems. This should turn television sets into teaching machines, bringing computer-assisted learning into the home. From the comfort of his armchair someone at home will be able to work through educational programmes, his progress monitored by the computer.

The most ambitious educational use for Viewdata so far is bieng planned by the New Opportunities Press, publishers of Graduate Opportunities, which lists jobs for graduates and is given free to final year students. Mr Tony Felix, the managing director, says that printed careers guides of this sort have disadvantages: there is a time lag between a vacancy occurring and the guide appearing in print; there is an enormous number of different publications; and guides cannot be altered oce vacancies are filled. Viewdata, which can be updated at a moment's notice, overcomes all these difficulties.

A set complete with keyboard for sending messages.

New Opportunities Press is therefore planning to place modified television sets in 14 universities or polytechnics in the trial area, and eventually intends to extend this service to careers departments in all colleges offering degree level work. In addition students will be able to use a freephone service to phone a central computer link (rather like computacar services). Neither universities nor students will pay—the cost will be born by the employers advertising vacancies.

Far-reaching plans for using Viewdata are also being drawn up by Fergus Davidson Associates Ltd., which specializes in education and training films.

Mr Fergus Davidson said his firm was already developing an extension of Viewdata which would incorporate a Telex machine, giving a printout of a Viewdata page. Minimum English standards set for student

O level standards in English and maths will be expected of all entrants to teacher training from September 1980.

Applicants will be expected to have at least a grade C at O level or a grade 1 in CSE or otherwise satisfy the college they are of equivalent numeracy and literacy.

Announcing the new requirements, the DES points out that as 1979 is the last year of entry to the certificate course, candidates for courses leading to qualified teacher status will have to have degree entry qualifications by 1980 anyway.

Colleges are asked to let the DES know by the end of 1978 what arrangements they envisage for testing the competence of applicants lacking formal qualifications in maths and English. These arrangements will also apply to students now beyond O levels but without the two subject qualifications in them.

Fast bowler given all CLEA

by Lucy Hodges

New life is being breathed into the Council of Local Education Authorities with the appointment of Mr Ivor Widdison as its first full-time officer.

Mr Widdison, aged 41, is at present an administrative assistant of the Association of County Councils, and has been handling routine CLEA business for years. At the ACC he has specialized in youth and community work, industrial training, teachers' conditions of service and agricultural education as well as handling much of the administrative work—the writing of minutes and agenda—of the association's education committee.

Mr Widdison is not an educationist but has been in local government for more than 20 years. He worked with Nottinghamshire County Council in the school health service and with the former Association of Municipal Corporations for three years. In his spare time he is a medium fast bowler for Gravesend.

He has been with the ACC (the old County Councils Association) since 1967. His new salary will be paid jointly by the ACC and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the two bodies which have spawned CLEA, but the ACC, where he will be based, will meet all administrative costs.

Mr Widdison says he will make very sure that the ACC does not dominate CLEA and points out that CLEA is being housed by the ACC because the Further Education Advisory Team is at the AMA.

Ivor Widdison: conscious of restraints on power.

In reply to questions about how much power CLEA will have, he refers to the history—and subsequent demise—of the Association of Education Committees. This was the organization which spoke for the education service before local government reorganization and which was thought by the other services to have regarded itself as separate and superior.

Mr Widdison says that if CLEA were to become powerful in the same way as the AEC its constituent associations could hardly be blamed for reducing some of this power. "We have got to have an effective voice but in the context of the generalities of local government", he says.

It is not just memories of the AEC which have taken the two associations so long to give any flesh to CLEA's bones but also the fact that the associations each have well established education officers—Mr Peter Sloman and Mr Gordon Cunningham—whom, it is believed, were reluctant to see their responsibilities eroded.

Ban sex-object ads, women teachers urge

by Stephen Cohen

Advertisements which use women as sex objects should be banned, the Association of Assistant Mistresses has told the Government.

The 32,000-strong association of women teachers said the Sex Discrimination Act should be used against posters and commercials which portrayed women in this way.

In evidence to the Home Office Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship, the AAM said it hoped that the Act would help to get rid of these advertisements.

"We should like to see this Act, as well as the laws on obscenity, used to prevent the display of such advertisements which are detrimental to the concept of equality between the sexes."

The association said it was concerned about obscene material to which children and young people are exposed. Such material was found in posters, shops and all kinds of publications including record sleeves of pop, rock or punk music.

There had been an increase in the amount of this literature on display in stationers, bookstalls and sweet shops, and a deterioration in the standard of advertisements for films.

Laws on obscenity and indecency should be brought up to date, strengthened and stringently enforced with heavier penalties.

"We believe that juveniles should not be allowed to enter sex shops, and that the display of sex and pornographic magazines in stationers and sweetshops should be prohibited."

The language used on television and radio should be improved, the mistresses said.

"It is worrying to note that there are many young people, especially those who are less successful in their studies, who seem actively to enjoy obscene and crude material and gain pleasure and excitement from it."

The AAM also called for a national campaign on venereal disease "in view of the increase among young people".

The great hamburger haven

Science diary

again I've just returned from udge around science depart- s in some of the universities e United States, this time on ast coast. Jaunts such as these always stimulating—one sees things, meets new people and s something of the excitement always seems to be bubbling ath the surface in the United s. But this time I found this ience, though as vivid as ever, somewhat saddening. Re- dly I found myself asking her, and if so when, things be like this again at British ersities. Alas, the replies I myself were always despondent If my impressions are correct, easy enough to reach depres- conclusions about the states of h education as a whole.

six days of hectic rushing , I suppose I met between 40 50 research scientists, several hem for the first time. They ed from young men and women their twenties to distinguished past the age of retirement but hard at work in their labora- s. Perhaps inevitably, for is journalism, their fields of est were rather trendy—high- gy physics, the cosmological of astronomy, molecular bio- , climatology and things like y first impression, stronger than ny many previous journeys of kind, is that American scient- have become exceedingly articu- . They will explain what they doing, and why it is important, he drop of a hat. They seemed me to do so simply and clearly, as they wanted to be properly under- ood. Everybody knows, of course, at clarity of expression springs m knowing clearly what you nt to say, but the people I met , these American laboratories ere also experienced in telling hers what their research is all bout. They do talk shop quite tantly whenever they meet some- ne with a common interest. They re forever caught up in meetings ith their colleagues to plan the ork of their laboratory or to draft n application for funds to some grant-giving agency. They appear to travel incessantly to other laboratories, giving informal lectures, listening to people or helping out with an experiment. The result is that their own sense of the importance of what they are doing is to a large extent confirmed by what other people say about their work. Their intellectual environment is formly more stimulating for try- g out new ideas than that found n Britain (although there are some boratories in this country with st such an atmosphere).

y second strong impression is e sense of intellectual equality pervades these laboratories. uate students argue the toss out what their senior colleagues to say without restraint. More r people regard themselves as pendent scholars who expect to e their way in the world on the gth of their own intellectual rts and not by the patronage of od and the great.

, to round it all off, there great sense of informality that es the working lives of research scientists in the United States. They have always, of course, eaten their lunch from paper bags. I once spent a whole year in one of these intellectual greenhouses, choosing a different laboratory each day in which to perch on a laboratory stool and chat to people about the work on which they were engaged. This time, I found myself buying a hamburger from a sandwich van and then eating it at a symposium where somebody was trying to explain how the sun's corona may be heated. Several people chose to suck away at milk shakes and, for what it's worth, the minutes of the meeting were that the man with the theory of the sun's corona had better start again, from scratch.

Naturally it is not easy to tell whether these attributes of American science are causes or merely symptoms of its success. If causes, they must be only contributory ones. For the excitement conveyed to visitors stems from the knowledge that in the United States, in spite of all the money troubles of the past few years, it is still possible (and welcome) to do something for the first time. It is not a waste of time to spend your spare time dreaming of some new and expensive instrument, an earth satellite or a detector for fast particles. If you can persuade your colleagues that your scheme is a good one, then sooner or later Congress or one of its dependencies in faraway Washington will find the money. If you have a really good idea, and can show that it succeeds, it is still possible to hope that there will be at some university or other room for you to recruit a group of like-minded people to make a concerted attack on the questions you have raised.

This is the traditional ambition (and reward) of successful academic scientists, but the chances of it being attained within the British system are shrinking fast. More money will alas not put things right, and for two reasons. First, the British university system is now much less flexible than the American. Second, extra funds for strictly academic research will not yield the benefits that accrue to industry in the United States, where the economic climate is still such that whole new industries can spring up almost overnight. "Silicon Valley" in California, the centre of the micro-computer industry, is the equivalent in the 1970s of the belt of electronic industries spawned in the 1950s by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology along the ring road round Boston known as Route 128.

The consequences of all this for young British scientists are all too clear. If they are sure of themselves, sure of their chances of making a mark in research, they would be wise to go off to the United States quite early in their careers. Sadly this message already seems widely spread. I keep meeting young men and women who explain their worries about staying on in Britain. When they ask my advice, I am ashamed to say that I suggest that they should succumb to the temptation.

Only the best among them, however, will succeed in the competitive climate of the American universities. One obvious disadvantage from which they suffer is that graduate education in this country is no longer as systematic and as thorough as that provided by the best American universities. Logically, the best time for a scientist to move across the Atlantic is when he has finished his first degree. This message also appears to have sunk in, for at two of the American physics departments I visited last week I was asked why it should be that there were so many applications for places from students in Britain (and also Eire) wanting to read for a PhD. The explanation, of course, is clear.

The implications of this invidious comparison extend also to the earlier stages of the educational system. Most of the people I met last week had been brought up in American high schools and undergraduate schools and thus given an education that is still much despised this side of the Atlantic. One is bound to ask whether our scorn can continue to be justified.

If indeed such bright people can emerge from the high schools without the supposed benefits of an intensive A level course in physics, chemistry and mathematics, may it not be time for us to ask whether A level is as valuable an introduction to professional studies as we suppose it to be If the liberal arts element in American undergraduate education can nevertheless foster the education of specialists as articulate as those to whom I talked last week, may that not imply that the time has come for British universities to think of changing? My own view is that the time is long overdue for an examination of these disturbing questions.

Teachers can train in Israel

Jewish student teachers who intend to teach Jewish children either in voluntary or county schools will soon be doing part of their training in Israel.

In an attempt to meet the shortage of teachers of Hebrew and Jewish studies—there being no Jewish denominational college of education—the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and the Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan are offering summer holiday, and one-year courses.

The Jewish Educational Development Trust said this week that many teachers have had to be recruited from abroad for the 57 Jewish schools in Britain and for thousands of Jewish children in county schools.

Scholarships covering the full cost of tuition, board and residence for the courses in Israel are available from the trust to successful applicants.

900th ANNIVERSARY OF THE TOWER OF LONDON

It was built to guard the River Thames. But grew into a marketplace for murder.

The Tower of London is now a grim reminder of the past. Kings plotted within its walls. Rats scuttled down its staircases. Coins were minted, and children murdered.

It has been a palace, a prison, a museum and is now a monument. It holds a morbid fascination for tourists; as many as 20,000 of them a day.

The Telegraph Sunday Magazine unlocks the door to the Tower this weekend with a colourful commemoration of its 900th anniversary.

Jobs: why some are more equal

Two years ago 71 per cent of newly qualified teachers found jobs; this year the figure will almost certainly be less. Who are this year's successful applicants and how do they differ from their unemployed colleagues?

A survey of last year's leavers from two colleges of education in the Midlands revealed sharp contrasts in career chances between groups of students.

Graduates with the Post-Graduate Certificate of Education found jobs with greater ease than BEd students who, in turn, found it easier to get work than students leaving college with the Certificate in Education.

Primary-trained leavers, first to be hit by the impact of the falling birthrate, were much less successful in finding jobs. Male leavers found posts more easily than females (a fact which could not be accounted for solely by the concentration of females in the certificated primary-trained group).

Subjects on the DES shortage list commanded most weight in the job market; more than 80 per cent of students on handicraft, economics and science courses found jobs by July. More than 60 per cent of French and home economics students, and more than 50 per cent of music and maths students were similarly placed. Between 20 and 30 per cent of students leaving main courses in geography, religious education, history, English, dance, physical education and art found posts, and the least successful group of students in the survey were those on social studies courses of whom only 7 per cent found jobs.

These varying success rates cannot be explained by suggesting that those still without jobs were no longer trying hard. No matter how the survey responses were analysed—by sex, qualification, or main course studied—those without jobs had written more applications and yet had attended fewer interviews than those with jobs.

Few of the successful leavers had not obtained a job by the time of their fifth interview (36 per cent were offered jobs at their first interview). During the same period, many unsuccessful candidates had already made more than 100 applications. One leaver was still without a job after making 224 applications and having been short-listed for 12 interviews.

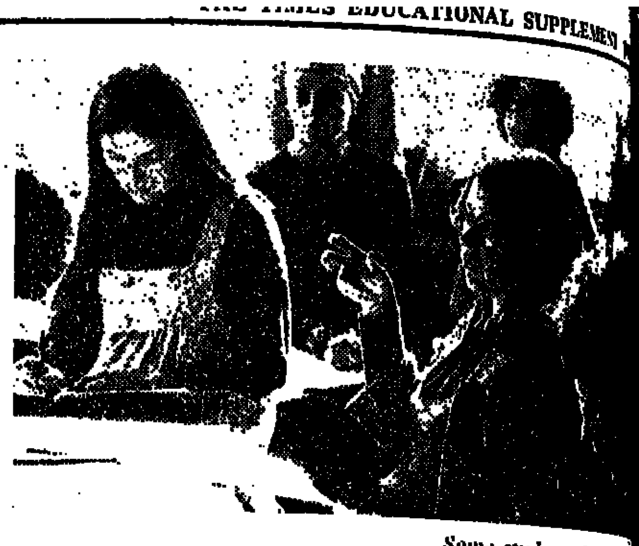
The less fortunate students reported that they were conscious of facing a number of obstacles which made finding a post more difficult than it need be. To cope with some of those problems, a set of ground rules was clearly being developed by the students.

First it was felt that the letter of application which accompanied the official application form was now of greater importance than it had been in the past. Heads received more than 1,000 applications for some vacancies.

	Average number of interviews Unsuccessful applicants	 Successful applicants
PGCE	2.69	3.31
BEd	1.10	3.08
Cert Ed	1.13	2.45
Infant-trained	1.11	1.86
Junior/Secondary trained	1.18	3.24
Secondary-trained	1.74	3.00
Male	2.78	3.05
Female	1.57	2.24

At interviews, students felt they were often asked questions which were "worse than in the BEd exams". The traditional line of inquiry, such as "How would you get fifth-form boys interested in poetry?", could be fended off with the usual clichés, but even articulate students with informed views on education felt unprepared for more detailed questions.

Students displayed ambivalent attitudes towards the grading of their professional competence on their degrees and certificates. Some agreed with college policy not to grade teaching practice performance; others felt that there should be more grading, particularly on the certificate. But all agreed that a lack of understanding on the part of the schools often put them at a disadvantage in competition with leavers from other colleges which operated differing or more graduated assessment schemes.



Some students have a

One wrote: "I feel we would be considered more readily if it were possible to get a Distinction for teaching practice" while another who had obtained a Credit under a now discarded system of Pass/Credit categories found that she "had problems convincing authorities that my Credit was as good as a Distinction from colleges using a Pass/Distinction classification".

Naturally, students from colleges which have followed the trend towards a Pass/Fail classification for this part of the certificate or degree felt themselves to be at an even greater disadvantage. There was evidence of a rumour that without graded teaching practice assessments from the colleges, some authorities were using O and A level GCE grades as substitutes.

Despite the gloom that surrounds employment prospects for most young teachers, and the encountered in the app procedure, it was notic few of this year's leavers had decided to careers outside educatio

The overwhelming unplaced leavers are s mined to teach alongside leagues who found posts tive ease before the las year ended. Early disap has not seriously weake resolve to continue app teaching posts until they ional. Union of Students voice to the campaign for sports opportunities—with reference to the 16 to 19 oup—at a conference in London president Chris Pratt, the tive member responsible for said the future of student should be looked at in relato the recreational needs of community as a whole.

e union is to ask for discuswith the principals of colof further education as a first towards improving recreational rtunities. It will also try to e trade unions and community ps in its campaign.

Pratt, who is at Leeds Polyic, said the NUS wants a meetwith the British Association for in Colleges, which has been d under the aegis of the Asson of Further Education prins.

th the union and the Associa for Sport are aware that the er education sector is poorly pped for sport. Mr Pratt wants to see how the union can fit in with the work of the association, which is headed by Mr Hugh Johnson, principal of the Airedale and Wharfedale College of Further Education in Leeds.

The cut-off at 16, he told the meeting, was the end of sporting activity for 80 per cent of the population. Opportunities and facilities were few unless school leavers advanced into higher education or joined the armed forces.

"If something can be done about the 16 to 19s, we will be getting somewhere", said Mr Pratt. In long-term economic planning it was essential to take leisure activities into account, especially with so much talk of a shorter working week.

He would like universities and colleges to open their sports amenities to the community.

Local students' unions and the three national sports organizations (covering universities, colleges of education and polytechnics) are also being asked to support the campaign.

Two sabreurs with experience and table records in Continental tournaments are Mark Slade and Gary Li. Slade, a senior championship finalist in 1966 and 1967, has just scored his second successive British universities victory for Cambridge and is an outstanding sabre prospect. Gary Li, the London under-20 international winner, is close behind him.

Inevitably some will fail to survive even the earliest rounds since all are much less seasoned than many of the senior world class fencers they will meet, but so was Rob Bruniges, who won the foil gold medal for Great Britain in 1976. The team:

Welsh happy

There is satisfaction in Welsh school badminton circles after their first team victory in the annual quadrangular match, this time held in Cardiff. Their 5-4 win came in the ninth and last game against Scotland; Philip Sutton (Ebbw Vale Comprehensive School) and Sharon Vickery (Rumney Technical College) beat Graham Smith and Sue Doherty 14-15, 15-10, 15-3.

Sutton, the Welsh under-18 champion and senior finalist, won five of his six games in Cardiff, the sole defeat being in the mixed doubles when he and Miss Vickery went down 16-17, 5-15 to the English pair, Diane Simpson (Yorkshire) and Ian Teasdale (Hampshire).

The English, who beat Wales 8—1, defeated Ireland and Scotland, 7—2 in each case, to win the championship again.

West Germany

New effort to solve entry crush

by David Dungworth

The Committee of Länder Education Ministers has agreed to significant changes in the procedure for admitting students to West German universities. A new inter-state treaty is expected to be signed by the heads of the Länder governments this month.

The changes are required to bring the admissions system into line with the provisions of the Framework Law for Institutions of Higher Education and represent a compromise between the conflicting views of the Social Democrat Länder and those controlled by the Bonn Opposition Christian Democrats.

The compromise has been achieved only after many months of wrangling and under the threat of intervention by the federal government if an agreement was not reached.

Entry to departments in which the supply of places at all universities exceeds the total number of applicants will be regulated by a "distribution procedure" to prevent overcrowding at the more popular centres.

Two forms of selection will operate where there are not enough places. In most subjects there will be a general selection procedure under which the majority of places will continue to be allocated as at present according to a candidate's average mark in the Abitur examination and the time which has elapsed since he made his first application.

In subjects in which this "waiting time" exceeds three years, a "special selection procedure" will be introduced.

Thirty per cent of the available places will be reserved for candidates who have been unsuccessful in earlier years together with those who are entitled to special treatment on, for example, medical grounds or because of unusual family circumstances.

Of the remaining 70 per cent of places, half will go to the applicants with the best Abitur marks and the rest will be allocated by lottery.

Herr Walter Braun, Minister of Education for Schleswig-Holstein and chairman of the committee, said that the special selection procedure is likely to apply only in the "hard-core" numerus clausus subjects: architecture, biology, chemistry, dentistry, medicine, pharmacy, psychology and veterinary surgery.

The purpose of the lottery is to reduce waiting times and the importance of high Abitur marks which, it is felt, have led to excessive concentration on examination work in the sixth forms of grammar schools.

The lottery issue aroused the greatest controversy in the committee. The Christian Democrats and their Bavarian allies favoured a combination of Abitur marks and aptitude tests.

At their meeting the Länder Education Ministers also accepted the principle of "overloading of quotas" as a means of coping with the expected increase in the demand for places over the next five years.

Additional staff are to be appointed with limited tenure in an attempt to provide enough places for all qualified applicants, though not always in the subjects of their first choice.

Alaska is embarking on a $93m programme to build secondary schools in 126 remote native villages. The state agreed to spend the money when it settled a lawsuit brought by Alaskan Indians, Eskimos and Aleut children. The case alleged racial discrimination in the provision of high schools.

Thirty per cent of Alaska's native children have no local secondary school and have to attend regional boarding schools, while more than 99 per cent of the state's white children, including those in very sparsely populated areas, are [illegible] local high schools.

Teachers likely to get 8pc pay rise

from John Walshe

DUBLIN

Over 35,000 teachers in the Republic are likely to get an 8 per cent salary increase this year following talks on a further National Wage Agreement by the Employer-Labour Conference.

The conference, which has formulated all recent national agreements, comprises representatives of the various employer organizations, the state as employer and semi-state bodies, while the labour side consists of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions (ICTU), the central body for the trade union movement in Ireland.

The deal allows for a second phase, covering a three-month period, during which salaries would go up by a further 2 per cent.

There is also provision for further increases at local industry level, but this will not benefit teachers or others in the public sector as it is intended to cover private enterprise productivity deals.

A special delegate meeting of the ICTU is being held to discuss the agreement which is basically aimed at buying industrial peace. The majority of Irish teachers are unionized, and their unions are expected to vote in favour of the pay deal.

National pay agreements determine annual increases in teachers' salaries, but claims for other items, such as examination pay and allowances for posts of responsibility are channelled through the Teachers' Conciliation and Arbitration Scheme. This has representatives of the teacher unions as well as the school managerial and the government.

Announcing a new addition to the Keep Britain Tidy Group Education Programme.

A learning kit for use by teachers with children 7-9.

Following the success of the environmental learning kits for children of 10-11, the Keep Britain Tidy Group Schools Research Project at Brighton Polytechnic have now produced a new kit for 7-9 year olds as the second stage of the KBTG Education Programme.

Both kits aim to give children an understanding of a responsible attitude towards litter and related problems in the local environment.

The project adopts an environmental studies approach. Children start by studying their local litter problem—how it affects their environment and how it can be avoided. Later they work on topics like packaging, recycling and refuse disposal and lead on to the wider issues of planning, waste and pollution. Interesting and practical exercises encourage the development of study and social skills through interdisciplinary project work linked to maths, science, history, art, drama and crafts.

Each kit contains a teachers handbook, work cards (laminated for durability), a film strip and notes, three wallcharts, litter prevention posters plus an initial supply of plastic gloves to protect the children handling litter. Enough material to involve a class of 35-40 children in activities lasting up to a term.

Both kits and a Welsh version of the 10-11 kit are available from Keep Britain Tidy Group, 37 West Street, Brighton BN1 2RE. Each kit costs £8 plus 80p p&p.

eft, yes—but cool on Communists

e eve of the crucial ch general elections, Gretton looks at the g intentions and tional attitudes of the ry's teachers half of France's teachers to vote Socialist in this s general election, and nearly out of 10 will be voting for wing candidate of some sort. ven though only 15 per cent vote Communist on the first ting ballot, nearly two thirds do so on the second, final in preference to a Gaullist n candidate.

educational questions, the rs appear mildly progressive ainly as compared with the lly conservative attitudes of English colleagues. Although end to agree that standards een falling, they think that, thing, less emphasis should be on examinations, they are early specialization, feel that evelopment of the personality come before the acquisition owledge and are only mar y against letting parents have in the curriculum.

se conclusions emerge from vey of teacher attitudes carried principally for Le Monde de cation by SOFRES. One in thousand of France's 618,000 ary and secondary school ers (including 113,000 in te schools) was interviewed.

th the content and the metho gy of the survey were closely delled on the pioneering exer carried out for the TES at the of the October 1974 British eral election and repeated last ar.

Two sets of questions were particularly revealing about political attitudes: one concerned voting intentions at the next election, the other asked the teachers to rank themselves on a scale going from extreme right to extreme left.

First ballot voting intentions make it clear that the Socialist Party of M François Mitterand enjoys the same popularity among teachers as the Gaullist coalition does among Frenchmen as a whole.

However, the Communists were less popular; indeed, the two conventional extremes of French politics, the Communists and the Gaullists, were both less popular with teachers than with everybody else. Yet there was no doubt in teachers' minds which they disliked most: asked to choose, on the second ballot, between a Communist and a Gaullist, over six out of 10 would choose a Communist.

On the general principle that the French vote "for" on the first ballot, and "against" on the second, teachers in general would vote for a Socialist, but a large number of non-Communists would do anything, including voting Communist, to stop the present government getting back in.

The greatest Communist support came from those in their forties, whose earliest political activities would have been at the time of the Resistance and the first postwar governments, when Communist influence was at its height.

Similarly, over half of those in their thirties, presumably influenced by the dominant role played by the old SFIO in the Fourth Republic up to 1958, supported the Socialists.

On the basis of voting intention, then, French teachers appear to occupy a central position between the Gaullists and the Communists. However, they also saw themselves as further to the left than the supporters of each party among the population as a whole.

Thus, whereas two thirds of French Communists classed themselves as left-wing or extreme left-wing, among the teachers the proportion rose to 86 per cent. It was the same with Socialist supporters: two thirds of French supporters saw themselves as being centre-left, left or extreme-left; but in the case of teachers, the proportion rose to 90 per cent.

To what extent was this left-wing stance reflected in their professional attitudes?

Only one in 10 thought, on the basis of their own experience, that standards were rising, and over half thought they were going down. Socialist Party supporters followed the general pattern: only four out of 10 Communists, however, thought they were going down, while two out of 10 thought they were going up. Primary school teachers (19 per cent of whom support the Communists, as opposed to only 12 per cent among secondary school teachers) were midway between the two.

This pattern was widely repeated. In other words, unlike the Socialists—and even more unlike their English political colleagues—French Communist teachers contain a significant proportion of genuine educational progressives.

Thus, the Communists were evenly split between those who thought more freedom should be given to children and those who thought there should be no change; only one in 10 (but nearly two in 10 Socialists) thought pupils should have less freedom.

Overall, the sample was, just, opposed to a parental say in the curriculum (52 per cent against, 45 per cent in favour). The Socialists split 57 per cent against, 40 per cent in favour. The Communists, however, split the other way; 54 per cent in favour, and only 43 per cent against. There was general agreement (55 per cent) in favour of a common curriculum for as long as possible.

A striking difference emerges over the school-leaving age. Nearly half the Communists (48 per cent) were in favour of raising it to 17, but only 14 per cent of Socialists. The remainder—both Communists and Socialists—were more or less evenly divided between leaving it where it is, at 16, and lowering it back to 14.

The sample was asked whether they thought being a teacher brought them prestige. Overall, four out of 10 thought it brought them virtually none, and six out of 10 Communists thought the same. Practically nobody thought it brought them a lot, but those who thought it brought them a fair amount were mainly to be found among the under-30s and over-50s, those in private schools and in lycées.

Your neighbour... or yourself?

Let's face it, it could easily be you. Needing help to get upstairs, through doorways, into toilets and on to public transport.

If you take your own freedom of movement for granted, the disabled may seem like a race apart. In fact, they share your hopes, your interests and many of your abilities. They never willingly opt out of society but all too frequently find themselves excluded from it.

Disabled people have to face problems of environment as well as physical disability. For without proper planning and an understanding of their special needs the chance of independence is denied them.

The disabled have a right to full citizenship. Your understanding can help them to enjoy it.

Wheelchair living is a thought-provoking subject and an important aspect of social studies. It offers a topical theme for Assembly, for class discussion or a term project. We'll gladly send, without obligation, informative literature, details of our 16mm colour films, Speaker services, and teacher's project material.

Private sector set for big fee rises from Gareth Harry

PARIS

A ten-fold increase in fees faces parents with children in private Catholic schools. Currently, school fees average around 890 francs (£100) a year. The removal of state subsidies to private education will, it is estimated, increase this to around 9,900 francs.

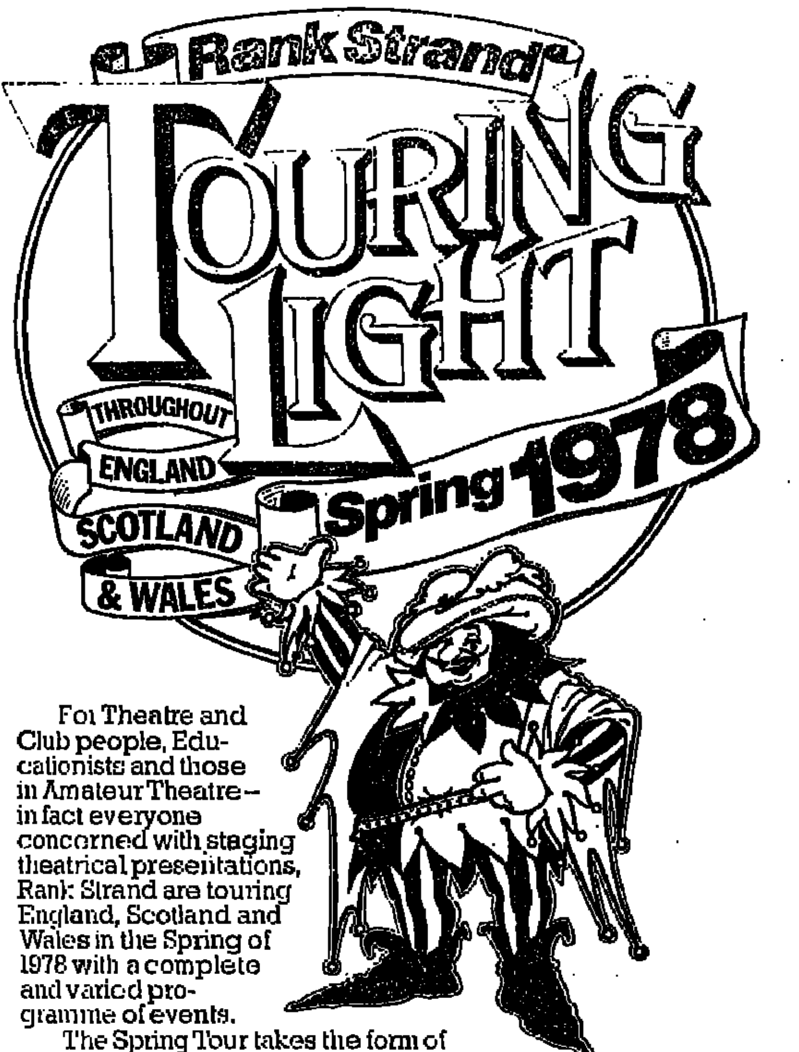
The figures were given at a press conference by the National Federation of Management Bodies in Catholic Schools. The conference was called to state the position of the Catholic lobby on the eve of the elections.

The battle over state subsidies to private schools has become particularly bitter with the announcement by the Socialist Party that it will not necessarily subsidize private education if it is returned to power.

State subsidies to the private sector amount to 6,550m francs a year for teachers' salaries and a further 850m francs for running costs. Fees thus account for some 23 per cent of the total costs to the sector.

Private schools in France are in the main religious. The teaching of religious education in state schools is forbidden, so parents who wish their children to be educated in this manner have to send them to the private sector.

Among the concerns of the national federation is the setting of standards common to the whole denominational sector. Catholic schools vary greatly in resources and academic standards. This is one of the reasons why parents with able children are reluctant to send their offspring to the private sector.



For Theatre and Club people, Educationists and those in Amateur Theatre—in fact everyone concerned with staging theatrical presentations, Rank Strand are touring England, Scotland and Wales in the Spring of 1978 with a complete and varied programme of events.

The Spring Tour takes the form of a travelling exhibition of a wide range of stage lighting luminaires and controls—some that you may have seen before, others that you definitely haven't. You will be able to inspect, and use, all the equipment at any of the venues. Additionally, in each location, an illustrated talk on stage lighting or other associated subjects will be held on one evening.

Admission to each event is free, but a ticket is required for each lecture, which can be obtained prior to each event by writing to the address below—enclosing a self-addressed envelope please.

Right approach to Oxbridge

Sir,—I have for some years watched with disquiet, the signs mentioned by your previous correspondents, Mr Moore (January 20) and Mr English (February 3) concerning the increased difficulty experienced by bright pupils from state schools when seeking entry to Oxbridge. However, my own experience leads me to be somewhat less pessimistic. It is a matter of knowing how to enter the competition in the right way.

For some years, while teaching in an independent school, I learnt to recognize the sort of ability which was capable of gaining commoner's entry or an award in the seventh-term exams. When I later moved to a comprehensive school and came across the same ability, albeit in lower concentration, it proved possible to bring it successfully to the notice of at least some of the Oxbridge colleges. I have found that the following rules apply:

(a) An outstandingly able student should be put in for the fourth-term exam (entry only).

(b) A candidate of lower academic ability with a strong outgoing personality, wide interests and likely to get, say two As and a B at A level should be sent for interview to a college offering conditional places.

(c) A traditional link with one or two colleges is worth fostering by personal contact, involving visits with parties of sixth formers.

My concern is not so much with whether success can be achieved or not, but whether one should compete at all.

Principle behind the race report cuts

Sir,—As members of the Consultative committee of the Schools Council project "Education for a Multi-racial Society", we are concerned by the decision taken by the Programme Committee on drastically edit the first section of the report.

There were no doubts or criticisms expressed by any members of the project during our four years as members of the committee, and this includes those members who represented the unions. On the contrary, drafts of every chapter were circulated, and approved by every member.

We agree that the Programme Committee is vested with the power to take action, but what remains unclear and therefore unsatisfactory are the real reasons for the decision taken. From various newspaper reports, the reasons given appear to be inconsistent. They range from outbursts which refer to the report as "a propaganda thesis about race", to observations that it is "over journalized", "anecdotal", "too long", "overweighted", and more recently "deficient".

We seriously wonder whether the nature of the background against which this report was written is fully understood by the Programme Committee, who seem to be far removed from the concept of a multi-racial society.

Any proposed innovations in our schools need to be placed within a context that teachers will need to understand, and this requires that the situation be clearly defined. It seems a contradiction in terms to express a wish for innovation on the one hand, and then proceed to "play down" the observations which could bring about its understanding. We are aware that observations alone cannot solve problems, but they can and often do help to elucidate them. Furthermore, they may of necessity touch on sensitive areas, be seen as unpalatable, and provoke controversy; but these reactions can hardly be considered sufficient grounds for not posing them.

It is also presumptuous for teacher representatives to claim the right to prescribe how far children of minority groups should be assimilated in this society. That is a decision which children will have to make for themselves, for they do have a choice. Some will assimilate entirely; others will retain and relate more significantly to their own culture which they understand, and which gives them a sense of security and identity.

Is it too much to hope that the Schools Council will recall the Consultative Committee in order to explain more fully on what grounds this unwise and unrealistic decision was taken?

YVONNE CONOLLY,

TUKU MUKHERJEE,
London N1.

Sir,—Clearly I spoke too soon when I thanked you for the very fair and balanced report in your February 10 issue on the decision of the Schools Council's Programme Committee about the report of the Multi-Racial Project. This week your staff revert to type and report in the style, so beloved of the ladies of the TES, whereby the Schools Council is treated at gossip-column level.

It is in keeping with that style that serious issues of principle and fact should be subordinated to tittle tattle about personalities. Apparently, for example, if I had put my "oar in earlier" the controversial project report might not have run into trouble. Similarly, it is implied, the trouble over the Stenhouse Race Pack might have been averted if I had not "failed to turn up" at a subcommittee meeting (I believe I was ill at the time).

The same kind of absurd statement is made about the "block vote" of the NUT. You state, without any justification whatever, that the Stenhouse Race Pack never saw the light of day because of the NUT's "block vote" in the Programme Committee. The NUT has, in fact, four members on the committee, the total membership of which is 22, and so it is incapable of determining anything by its so-called "block vote". But in any case, as with the Multi-Racial Project report, the opposition in the Programme Committee was general and not confined to the NUT members. Indeed the first expression of concern ab came from the DES.

Your report is al in suggesting that th tion to the Race P contained "some di about black power". ing was the avow material it contained cipal reason for th decision was that it the concept of a " man" was appropriat room handling of the and the material in th pack, and I see no between that view gramme Committee's deciding it could not lication of the report Racial Project in its p

Why operation bootstraps

Sir,—How can alienated, working-class black youth in Britain be rescued from semi-literacy, despondency, ennui, unemployment and eventual crime? How can the black and other immigrant youths attain a confidence in their own strength and dignity?

All these are questions that spring to mind after reading depressingly through last week's issue of the TES. On the one hand one reads of desperate and sincere efforts by the well-intentioned staff at Tulse Hill's history department groping with a leviathan problem and getting nowhere fast, because of the sheer problem. On the other hand is the mushrooming of black self-help projects throughout the country (for example, Brother Herman of Harambee, Hal Austin and Len Garrison of the Afro-Caribbean resources) an drabing the bull by the horns and doing their own thing as best they can.

The desperate situation in education today obviously put the authorities on the spot as to whether they should support self-help projects or not. But while they ponder their decisions these self help projects will gain confidence, respectability and expertise in their own right. One project leader named such projects simply "opera straps", as the last to put a halt to a situation. Project lead spoken to say that they have lost the educational system likewise reluctantly respect for any autho feel quite justifiably th had no say in how th is administered and the USA, blacks are co their absence in any authority and that th ible for their low sta stigma and black

Costing student fees

Sir,—The recent Times' report (February 7) that the Government is considering further increases in overseas students' fees is perturbing. The proposition that they should be asked to pay the "economic cost" of their courses has a certain plausibility but before it is acted upon, it is worth asking whether this is correctly calculated. Postgraduate historians from overseas periodically ask me what they are paying their fees for. As their supervisor, I ought to be able to answer them, and at present I cannot.

I understand that the present figures are arrived at by the crude process of dividing the total cost of universities by the number of students in them. If so, this process may give very misleading results. Most facilities used by overseas students, in particular by postgraduates, would have to be continued even if there were not a single overseas student in this country.

Most overseas students are accepted through the willingness of most university staff to work even harder than we do already, and therefore they do not account for any significant proportion of our staffing establishment. In these circumstances, a more correct way of costing the demands they make on facilities would be the marginal cost.

For the overseas postgraduates I supervise, I believe the marginal cost of having them in the university is far below the fees they are at present paying. I would find it as hard to justify the rumoured higher level of fees to them as I would to dispense with the vital contribution they make to the internationally famous standards of the University of London.

English Teachers!

Can your pupils write a letter worth £600?

They could win £100 in National Savings for themselves plus £500 for the school they attend – and provide Britain's entry in an international competition.

The Post Office is again running its popular children's letter writing competition and the theme this year is "The Postman – My Best Friend." There are top national prizes of £100 in two age categories, plus £500 for both schools. Other prizes are offered for 20 Regional winners and their schools (£25 and £50 each respectively) and also runners up (£5). The prizes for the schools are being donated by the British Stationery and Office Products Federation.

The aim of the competition is to foster the art of letter writing and to encourage students to take an interest in and learn more about the part Postal Services play in the nation's life.

The national winners will be chosen from the regional winners by a panel of judges: Michael Marland, CBE, Headmaster and Chairman of the Schools Council's English Committee; broadcaster Noel Edmonds; Tom Jackson, General Secretary of the Union of Post Office Workers; Leonard Pagliero, OBE FRCS, Director of the British Stationery and Office Products Federation; and Denis Roberts, CBE, Managing Director, Posts, who will be Chairman. The panel will nominate a British entry to the International Letter-writing Competition of the Universal Postal Union, to be judged by UNESCO. Last year the British winner won third prize.

There are two entry groups.
A. Up to and including 10 years on 31 July 1978.
B. 11 to 15 years inclusive on 31 July 1978.

Entries going forward to the international competition must be between 500 and 1000 words. Closing date is 2 May.

For details of the rules and the preparation of entries, please write as soon as possible to Simon Boylett, Letter Writing Competition, Postal Headquarters, St. Martin's-le-Grand, LONDON EC1A 1HQ or call at your local Post Office for a leaflet.

But isn't this all nonsense and a sad reflection on the make do and mend system of British education? We are now penalizing the able and serious student and it is time the gap was bridged between mandatory awards (and to include DipHE requiring no qualifications when Ordinary National Diplomas are not eligible seems most unjust) and Manpower Services Commission payments to the disadvantaged.

Sandwiched between are the bulk of society's young people who form the nucleus of our future skilled labour force, and who are being treated most shabbily. Birth film: what the pupils thought

Sir,—I have just read Leila Berg's review (February 10) of Granada Television's programme about the birth of a baby to my class of 15 and 16-year-old boys and girls, who recently watched the programme with me. There was no one who thought that the programme should not have been shown, although two girls chose not to watch it, and spent the time in the library instead. In fact, although some people felt that the film was rather gory, and that the close-ups of the perineum were perhaps held rather too long, the general opinion was that the programme showed things as they are, and that this was a good thing.

The pupils were told at the outset that they need not watch the programme at all and were free to leave the room at any time, but in fact no one found it necessary to do so. Interestingly, one boy suggested that the series should be shown to 14-year-olds, and the others agreed.

Incidentally, it is at the suggestion of my class that I am writing to you—they felt that the balance needed redressing.

"Here, you can have it explained to you as many times as you want; in school, the teacher would explain it to you twice. After that, you was an idiot."

What adult literacy provision is trying to do is offer the time and resources to people like Dick to rediscover their own pace of learning, and their own power as learners.

Calling someone ESN on the basis of their performance with certain pieces of paper and their responses to certain oral questions is returning us to the false equation of literacy equals intelligence. What worries us is that while many adult literacy workers theoretically reject this equation, there seem to be renewed efforts in some quarters to revive the notion that if the teaching formula doesn't work, it is the learner that's wrong.

entries, which are one way to few of the inevitable mistakes, f the question in this economic and deliberately prevented by aneous timetabling of GCE and ns, in London, at least. ve tried to keep our pupils pen for them by developing parallel Mode 3 CSE and GCE courses. Our CSE Mode 3 was accepted warmly and with alacrity. It is now in its third year. The GCE board, however, prevaricated, arguing that the coursework was too extensive and the exam too difficult. In the end they made the scheme financially prohibitive, and we had to find an O level course which approximated to our Mode 3 CSE.

As a result we face the additional pressure of holding classes after school in the fifth year to prepare prospective O level candidates for the slightly different GCE exams. This is particularly irritating, as we have a low opinion of the multiple-choice examining techniques much favoured by GCE boards. Yet, while there are two exams, and O level continues, however misguidedly, to be regarded as the status exam, schools feel obliged to offer their pupils both exams, however tiresome and expensive this is.

Many parents are confused by the two exams and the internal selection process. Since the divided exam only benefits the top 20 per cent selected for GCE, and then often only in the narrowest sense of "status", they see that this system is more likely to discriminate against their children than help them. The majority are consigned to CSE groups in the way they used to be consigned to secondary moderns.

Of course, some parents are able to exert pressure and ensure selection for O level for their borderline son or daughter. Who can blame them? But all too often this brings tragic consequences for the children who have to struggle to keep up, but do not dare to admit it to themselves, their teachers or, least of all, their well-meaning parents. The psychological damage of being "put down to CSE" later on is immense.

Not surprisingly, pupils dislike being segregated, especially when they feel the selection was not based upon their best efforts, for one reason or another. The sheep and goats syndrome then becomes a reality. As one CSE pupil said: "We are just normal, they [the GCE pupils] are geniuses". This can hardly be a healthy attitude for either group.

We must abandon a system which causes such personal devaluation and wastage of talent, time and money. Feasibility studies show that a common exam at 16-plus is possible. The examining boards say the demands for it from schools is increasing. The experience of schools such as ours show that a single assessment for the whole age group is a matter of the utmost urgency. What stands in the way?

Not sound educational arguments, certainly not economic or administrative gains, but elitism and the vested interests of the long-established GCE examining boards. Not surprisingly, the Secretary of State is scared of rocking the boat.

The comprehensive school in which I work bands classes from the first year of entry—two top band, six middle band and three remedial. In the fourth year pupils are offered a science, literary or technical course.

Depending on assessments at the end of the third year, they go into an O level, top CSE, middle CSE or remedial/social version of the course chosen. The three top classes, one for each course, are then setted for many subjects into O and CSE groups.

The other classes gradually set themselves into deprived O level aspirants, earnest CSE, reluctant CSE, Easter leavers and truants.

The existence of two examinations, O level and CSE, encourages the school to classify in this detailed way. The fact that one is endlessly reclassifying makes pupils acutely aware of the hierarchy of examinations.

The theory is impeccable: put pupils in for examinations they can actually get. This would be fine if we were dealing with robots. Let us, however, look at how this affects human beings.

Only 30+ pupils can go into the "top" O classes. Those whose end-of-third-year performance is affected by late development, illness, poor teacher-pupil relationships, or anxiety, plus the few there is simply no room for, go into one of the CSE classes.

If there were only one 16+ examination, pupils might feel upset at their failure to reach the "top", but they could confidently do their best to aim for a similar goal. They are aware, in their CSE group, that another examination exists which is more highly valued. If they work hard and ask to be transferred to the "top" class, they have to cope with a totally different syllabus in many subjects.

For English, we run a good but demanding Mode 3. This includes an oral project, continuous assessment of a large volume of critical and creative work and one examined comprehension. It tests a far wider range of skills than O level.

Yet a Grade 1 is desirable only because it is equated with the lowest O level pass. Its intrinsic value is obscured by the existence of O level, and even a value Grade 1 is subject to certain preconceptions—"you weren't in an O level class?" The fundamental differences in the two syllabuses make it impossible to combine O level and CSE teaching in one class with three hours a week of English lessons.

This year I have run an after-school class in O level English for any fifth year pupils who want to come. This is for the pupils' sake, and conflicts with my feelings about which is the better examination, educationally. I have to decide whether they can risk taking O level and failing, or taking CSE and gaining only a Grade 2. The ILEA does not permit candidates to take both examinations.

My son took both English examinations in an authority which does permit double entry, and gained an O level Grade C and a CSE Grade 2.

The English department used to set the "top" three fifth-year classes into two O level groups and one CSE. I have spent hours trying to make this awful decision—O or CSE—assessing skills, possibilities of maturation, but mostly the effect on pupils of "putting them down". They inevitably feel devalued, and a whole class of devalued pupils is hard to teach.

This year we decided not to set, so that the "top" three classes are all taking O level. Educationally I would prefer that they all took CSE, but in the existing situation this is not possible. They have responded amazingly well to what is really a form of praise, the most valuable motivating factor there is.

What about the other fifth-year classes? The day after the mock CSE comprehension on examinations, one of the pupils in what I could crudely call a "level 9" class came up to me. "I answered every question", he said. "But I saw the teachers look at each other as we came in. They were thinking, 'O God, here comes 5X.' We all did the exam though."

Examinations grade pupils and encourage people to do the same. 5X have come up the school in non-O level bands. Several teachers have tried to give them the self-esteem the examination-based grading system has withdrawn and they have responded. They know nevertheless that a Grade 4 CSE (an average 16-year-old level of attainment) means little to people outside school whose view of CSE is distorted by the shining O level goal.

My own fifth year form (level 7?) are struggling through their last few months of school. They feel they have been relegated to a second-class examination, and most of their energies are concentrated on gaining acceptance in the world of work. How can I really go into their English lesson and say, look, you must finish your folder because you will really need this CSE grade 2 or 3 or 4 when you leave? They will not.

I must go in and say, I believe this work is really valuable anyway. But for 5M the compulsory last year is for examinat[illegible]; and if the examination has little este[illegible], school is for catching up on last night's events, and making an effort for Mrs Rock because she seems to believe in you. Which of the employers they will go to could write a seven-page analysis of the techniques and ideas and characterization in Tunde's Film? Yet Michael's employer will see he has only CSEs, and he will only have those if I continue to put enormous energy into keeping him going.

O level's existence gives most people a ready-made value system. Schools have to be proud of their O levels. Parents and employers, who either have or haven't O levels, react accordingly. Pupils understand what it is all about. Education gets lost.

Children at work

Could it be that children learn more about the world of work by being workers, than by having a lesson on the subject? Colin Ward ponders the attraction of street work; Ann Golzen photographs children at work

North Europeans, visiting the cities of the Mediterranean, or North Americans visiting the cities of Latin America, sit in cafés in sunlit streets, noticing with what sweet gravity Yusef or Pedro takes their order, and with what a flourish of napkin over skinny arm he whisks away the dishes.

"Why, he can't be more than eleven", whispers one tourist to another, as they watch the boy in the bazaar, sitting cross-legged, stitching together the tooled leather purses they are about to buy.

The reflective traveller thinks about the long hours these children must work, but secretly contrasts the demeanour of the bored visiting children and the busy indigenous ones. Thoughts cross his mind that contradict the conventional wisdom about children and work.

But he knows that the industrial revolution in Britain reached its take-off point through the systematic exploitation of the labour of children, and that, decades later, the same was true of the period of maximum capital accumulation in United States industry, and that in consequence generations of humane people dedicated themselves to eradicating child labour.

He would certainly find it difficult to name an instance where juvenile labour had an institutionalized place in the economy and was not associated with unconcealed exploitation.

There is, of course, a fundamental difference between the situation of the child who must work, to support or help support the family, and the child who works to provide himself with those non-necessities which he would otherwise go without, or for which he would otherwise be dependent on others. This is the difference between child labour in the cities of the poor world, or in the poor districts of the rich world's cities, and the work performed by children in the rich world, where it is frowned upon but provides a different kind of experience: that of independence, rather than of servitude.

In developed economies the legitimate ways in which children can earn money for themselves outside school hours have dwindled to the consumer end of the distributive trades: filling the shelves in the supermarket, helping the milkman, delivering papers, and similar activities which depend on putting items with a low unit price into the hands of customers, at a delivery cost below the normal cost of labour. The obvious instance, sanctified in American folklore, is the paperboy.

From newsboy to editor, tycoon, mogul, president, is the stereotype celebrated in the nineteenth century by Horatio Alger, and exemplified by all those magnates who had the foresight and self-confidence to get photographed in the act of selling a newspaper when young.

Before the Second World War it was the practice in British cities to have two milk deliveries a day, the milkman being aided by a full-time 14-year-old. Nowadays, with only one delivery, boys, other than truants, are only able to "help the milkman" in school holidays or at weekends.

The prewar butcher's boy, baker's boy or grocery boy, who hoped to get a job in the shop after serving his time on deliveries, but usually simply joined the unemployed when he graduated from a boy's wage, is now in full-time schooling. His present equivalents are the boys and girls who work in the supermarket after school and at weekends, stocking the shelves, working on the check-outs, or more humbly collecting the trolleys.

A 15-year-old told me that he worked in the supermarket for two and a half hours after school each weekday and for eight and a half hours on Saturdays, at 50p an hour. Interesting work? Friendly people? No, he said, nobody knows anybody, nobody trusts anybody, they search you coming in and going out. "And they creep up behind you to see what you're doing." Many children earn the same money less onerously by baby-sitting.

More attractive for the child who enjoys human contacts, and easier to penetrate, is the street market. Something of the glamour of the fairground still clings to it, and the street trader often belongs to a family which has years of association with a particular pitch. There is an extravagant bonhomie which envelops the child helper, who is flattered by his easy acceptance, and feels he is absorbing something of the magic of the market—which of course he is.

Mayhew remarked that "am costers the term education i understood as meaning a comp ledge of the art of buying in the market and selling in the dearest a century later Elbert Hubbard "What boy, well raised, can with your street gamin who has ledge and the shrewdness of a broker?".

Children's contacts with manufacturing industry in the cities of the rich world are usually confined to those businesses which are small and informal enough to countenance the employment of casual labour without involving employment cards, tax deductions, unionization and so on: principally the ramifications of the garment and novelty industries, and similar small-scale, close-to-the-market trades.

Every now and then a small employer is prosecuted for employing children, or is quietly warned off by the inspector. The press picks up the story with headlines like "The Child Slaves of Streatham", but the slaves themselves, when consulted, tell a different story, talking bitterly of what they had proposed to do with the earnings they had been denied during the long summer holiday. Just like their parents, they would willingly forgo leisure for the sake of purchasing power.

Modern urban life exposes the young to the cornucopia of consumer desires while progressively denying them the means of gratifying these expensive wants except through the munificence of parents. The truant child quite often is a child who has found a means of making money, and who regards this as more pressing and more alluring than sitting in school for a lesson on coming to terms with the world of work.

The American ethos of self-help and independence, or of working your way through college, means that at least as far as high school and college students are concerned, it has taken for granted that they will augment their incomes by their own efforts, and that society will provide the opportunities. In Britain no such assumption is made. The whole trend of social legislation and of enlightened opinion has been progressively to postpone the entrance of the young into the labour market, while at the same time reducing the legal age of majority.

We consequently have the comedy of students in their twenties who have never been gainfully employed, acting out a kind of parody of the militancy of organized labour. Meanwhile children 10 years younger scour the city for a chance to be exploited.

Although two of these histories have multiple authorship, they have one author in common: the illustrious Professor Commager. Together with the late Allan Nevins, he published the first edition of America shortly after Pearl Harbour. Revised and enlarged five times since then and published in most of the world's languages, this latest edition brings the story up to the resignation of President Nixon and ends tartly with these words: "Just one month later, the new President, departing from his earlier assurances, granted an unconditional pardon to the man who had nominated him for the Presidency."

Commager's collaborators in A Concise History were the late Admiral Samuel E. Morison and Professor Leuchtenburg of Columbia University. It is, in fact, an abridged and revised version of The Growth of the American Republic which has been a classic American history for close on half a century. But it, too, is no slouch: it even covers the first year of the Ford Administration "Concise" is a relative term: it has nearly 800 pages (over half a million words) of text, more than 20 maps and about 250 illustrations. True, it costs, in paperback, more than three times as much as America, which is half its length, but America, though it has 12 maps, is not illustrated nor does it, as the Concise History does, throw in the Constitution of the US for good measure.

The Boston tea-party.

In Defence of the Public Liberty is also a history, but of a restricted period. It is subtitled: Britain, America, and the Struggle for Independence—from 1760 to the Surrender of Yorktown in 1781. Elegantly produced (in the US), with 10 well-drawn maps and over 50 portraits of the dramatis personae, the book is a joy—both to handle and to read. General Griffith, who has already several military histories to his credit, unfolds his story with considerable narrative skill. Whether he is writing of Britain, France or America, he recreates the contemporary scene so vividly that it comes as a shock to recall that 200 years have passed since the events he is recounting actually took place.

This is due in large measure to the way in which Griffith allows the protagonists to speak for themselves. He prefers to rely on quotations from what they said or wrote rather than on speculations about what they thought or felt. Other historic There are unlikely to be many ever familiar they may be tussles with his Ministers, Sa ades, George Washington's dict Arnold's turpitude, who something new in Griffith's bo

In this mixed bag of writing on recent history, C. J. Bartlett's History Of Post-War Britain stands out as a book which both teachers and students will surely welcome. It is a serious, useful survey, based on a wide range of published sources, and it concentrates on important trends in postwar British history—the retreat from Empire and loss of great power status, economic decline, social tensions and political change.

It is not without flaws. Mr Bartlett is sometimes inconsiderately allusive, bearing in mind that undergraduates and even sixth formers will want to use his book: his economical use of footnotes means that some of his judgments are presented as obiter dicta; and there are subjects which do not interest him much (such as student radicalism). On the other hand, he is thorough, lucid, balanced, and neither dull nor trendy.

He does not evade controversial questions, and although he is not an elegant stylist he writes with conviction and occasional touches of dry wit. His skilful use of quotation, from biographical and other sources, is particularly striking in a book as compressed as this. This thoroughly professional book is a good model for students learning how to write history as well as a reliable source of information. It will wear better than most textbooks.

By contrast, Professor Winkler's collection of essays on twentieth-century Britain is disappointing. Although the series title promises "New Viewpoints", the 13 articles and extracts from books reproduced here were first published, on average, over 10 years ago. Some are still useful, others decidedly dated, and a few are so undistinguished that one is tempted to wonder why they were ever published at all.

Professor Winkler's brief was, apparently, to select essays which gave a balanced coverage or "overview" of British history since the Great War. But "overviews" are best left to the textbooks, which do the job much more effectively than compilations of this kind. Articles are worth reprinting only if they make a real contribution to knowledge of understanding of the subject; and the growth of knowledge does not proceed in a balanced way. This volume seems altogether misconceived, and certainly overpriced.

Unlike Professor Winkler, Mr Blacksell and Mr Taylor both know what they are doing. Post-War Europe looks like the better buy for sixth form and college libraries. Written by a geographer, and primarily for geographers, historians and students of politics will nevertheless find it an excelle book and guide to the move European integration. What is a crime?

Conrad Russell on the history of crime in England

Crime in England 1550-1800. Edited by J. S. Cockburn
Methuen £6.95. 416 83970 3.

The history of crime differs from legal history as darkness does from light: indeed, one might borrow the image of a seventeenth-century judge, and say their union is "as unnatural as the union of a prisoner with his judge". The authors of the valuable, and often pioneering essays in this collection are not the heirs of Holdsworth and Stephen. They provide, it is true, much information about law, and, in particular, correct manifold misapprehensions about benefit of clergy. Yet even those contributors who come nearest to exploring the judicial point of view, such as Dr Beattie, are more interested in the administration of the courts than in traditional "legal history".

Dr Beattie's valuable account of eighteenth-century criminal trials in Surrey concerns itself with such questions as how many trials a court could get through in a day, and how the judge and juries selected, from among many eligible candidates, those who were to be hanged pour encourager les autres. In a meticulous Baedeker's guide to the criminal records, he offers valuable help to those who come after him, and Dr Linebaugh, in an exciting investigation of the Ordinary of Newgate, travels far in the twilight world between criminals and law enforcement officers.

In the main, however, it is the criminals, rather than the courts, who interest the contributors to these volumes. In approaching the study of the criminals, they show an intriguing variety of techniques. Professor Cockburn, in a magisterial and polished account of Home Circuit Assize records, firmly draws attention to a number of booby-traps in the records, such as the untrustworthiness of indictments as evidence on the address or occupation of criminals. He comments on crime committed by ex-soldiers, the relationship between robbery and death, and such regional variations as the exceptional frequency of highway robbery in Hertfordshire.

The two most exciting lines of investigation are those begun by Mr Sharpe and Mr Ingram. Mr Sharpe concentrates on a minute examination of the village of Kelvedon in Essex, and, by using the ecclesiastical court records as well as the secular court records, moves away from any notion of a defined area of "crime" or of "criminals" towards a detailed examination of villagers' relationships with each other. John Ayly, father and son, become characters of whom a Tudor and Stuart historian would find it rash to be ignorant. Mr Ingram, comparing Quarter Sessions records with the records of King's Bench and Common Pleas, investigates the extent to which litigation could be a form of anti-social behaviour: this is a line of investigation with a future.

Dr Macfarlane gives an account of witchcraft in Essex, without tackling the question which the contributions of Mr Ingram and Dr Curtis draw forcibly to our attention: why do village rivalries end in witchcraft charges in some parishes, and in trespass actions in others? Dr Malcolmson's account of eighteenth-century infanticide is sensitive and moving. He has admitted that his work is fiable, but his conclu unlikely to be Munsche, in a study o shire game laws, give example of one of the of this book: the Parliamentary legislation effects opposite to those Parliament's prohibition viously licit trade in poachers into monopo to a profitable trade.

ics, "the study of meaning", btedly a developing subject, which—perhaps more than anches of linguistics—allows be tied up with numerous fields of inquiry. Further- a large amount of research ready been done in semantics and this, together with work done in the even newer field miotics (the theory of signs he analysis of signalling s), means that any writer on ics has also to evaluate and this pre-existent corpus.

Professor Lyons and Pro- Palmer, writing on these e and difficult subjects, find need to do this, but whereas essor Palmer is deliberately troductory" (discussing more nt issues and developments only late chapter), Professor Lyons's ntial work, the first volume of h is self-contained and more al than the second, is very an attempt to set semantics in ider setting of semiotics and unication more generally ally in the first four chapters ume one). The effect of this etimes to make one feel that perhaps no longer such a viding line between what is ics and what is grammar or ics more generally, and this seems particularly evident in the author's discussion of things like the origin of language and dialectal variation.

Three further chapters of volume one discuss behaviourist semantics, logical semantics, and reference, sense and denotation, and Professor Lyons is especially interesting on a subject which has long held his attention, structural semantics (semantic fields; sense relations), which occupies the two last chapters. He now appears to be moving towards an interest in spatial and temporal expressions, to which a chapter of volume two is devoted. This volume does, in fact, deal with semantics from a more narrowly linguistic point of view, showing its close relationship with grammar, and is where his most original material is to be found.

I would not describe these books as easy reading: there is a massive number of technical terms (usefully, however, asterisked and carefully defined); and the introduction is, in fact, entitled "some basic terms and concepts". But the work is written with clarity, which is a relief these days.

Professor Palmer's book, following some introductory material, discusses the scope of semantics and carefully introduces the terms reference (dealing with the relationship between the linguistic elements and the non-linguistic world of experience) and sense (which relates to the complex system of relationships that hold between the linguistic elements themselves); semantic theories based on the latter alone are shown to be untenable.

Subsequent chapters deal with the non-linguistic context (reference), criticizing the views of Malinowski and Firth, Bloomfield, Sapir and Whorf; "Lexical Structure" (the problem of meaning approached from the point of view of sense relations — ie, relations within, not external to, language, discussing illuminatingly such phenomena as synonymy, polysemy and homonymy, the profoundly interesting "field theory", antonymy and others); the possibility of stating meaning purely in terms of the linguistic context; the analysis of the meaning of sentences; the relationship between semantics and grammar.

Both this book and the fuller discussions of Professor Lyons require careful reading as they go on, but neither author is unmindful of the reader, and they always try to be clear. Professor Palmer's introduction will doubtless prove a most successful stimulus for students in colleges and universities, while Professor Palmer's weighty tomes will give much food for thought to those who want to proceed further.

They Don't Speak Our Language, in the series "Explorations in Language Study", contains five essays on aspects of children's and adolescents' language. The editor contributes a short introduction and an essay on "The Language of Children and Adolescents and the Language of Schooling", in part a critique of Bernstein and "apocryphal Bernstein" which leads on to a discussion of middle-class (MC) and working-class (WC) language, during which Labov's investigation of negro Non-Standard English is also discussed. Clearly, teachers—many of them MC—have a problem: Dr Rogers believes that the solution is to start with the area of language usage where class differences are minimal, and then account for and explain to the children the varieties.

We seem to end up with two conclusions: that an MC code must not be imposed on WC children; that the ownership of a restricted code should not be encouraged. I find it hard to see that there is not something of an unresolved tension here.

Dr Widdowson's paper traces traditional verbal usages employed in dealing with children, concentrating on one specific lower MC Sheffield family. He takes us through "pregnancy sayings" ("She's got one up the spout", etc), communication devices used while the child is an infant, childish language used by the family (reduplicative forms, etc. "wee wee", "gee gee"), explanations given of natural phenomena ("The Devil's beating his wife" when it's thundering, etc), put-offs ("What's for dinner?" "A wingwam for a goose's bridle"), threats, commands and appeals. One specially interesting aspect of this sort of language is that it changes in the same way as all traditional vocabulary: the word bobba, once well-attested in Yorkshire and neighbouring counties, and used to express danger to a child, is now rapidly disappearing.

Catherine Snow continues the theme of "The Language of the Mother-Child Relationship", analysing how mothers talk to children—baby-talk, with its characteristic features of grammatical simplicity, redundancy content and special intonation patterns.

The book's title applies most relevantly to the last two essays. Clem Adelman deals with "The Language of Teenage Groups", and is particularly interesting on argot "group language" and the difficulties of initiation into it. Again the impermanence of this is emphasized, making it unlike occupational jargon.

Ramsey Rutherford's essay on "Talk About Pop" discusses the "unanalysable" language of schoolchildren, maintaining that examples of the sort he gives are designed to prevent adults understanding the feelings expressed and to allow peer group members to share in them. I'm afraid that to me it just looks inarticulate.

This essay is the worst offender in the use of the pretentious jargon we now expect from writers on language: "One has to invoke the concept of perceptual constancy in psychology", for example, or what about: "the collective topics of conversation of a group or a community or some such unity might be said to constitute the conversational cultural stock of that group". But it amuses me to find the idolized pop-figures referred to as "sub-group totems". Poor old Elvis.

Peter Ladefoged's book is what it says—a course—and is therefore liable to get harder as it goes on. Concentration in every part (perhaps especially that dealing with acoustic phonetics) is required if one is not to get lost en route. It is an ample work, and seems to cover everything, from a basic introduction of the vocal organs to "linguistic phonetics". Detailed notes on the articulation of the sounds and performance exercises are notable features. Throughout, Professor Ladefoged writes with an authority based on a grasp of the phonetics of many different languages, effortlessly providing examples from Arabic, Hausa, Swahili, Japanese, and so on.

Apart from possessing a course in phonetics, to read through the book is to gain pleasurable consciousness of the enormously rich variety of sounds which are both possible and actually existent in the languages of the world. Many of the pages also unconsciously reemphasize to the language historian the importance of phonetics in the process of sound-change. There is no way in which historical phonologists can escape being phoneticians. Although I have a few reservations over the transcriptions of certain sounds (but this is probably unavoidable), I recommend the book highly.

Students of linguistics who have made use of Professor Palmer's A Linguistic Study of the English Verb (1965) will be glad to have this rewritten and reorganized version (1974), which bears all the hallmarks of its distinguished predecessor.

's Britannia first appeared in Latin. Editions followed the sixth, much enlarged, in and then in 1610 there was nslation into English by "the parable" Philemon Holland, ed in 1637. There was another tion in 1695 by Edmund later Bishop of London; and yet another, also enlarged, hard Gough, of which the edition, 1806, is apparently st complete edition. Mr Cop reprinting and annotating edition in sections.

ritannia could be regarded first of the long series of histories, and guide books continue to expand and to extremes in kind and quality. was a scholar antiquary and who used Leland's notes followed by the under-rated nd the many dedicated of the massive folio stories of the eighteenth nineteenth centuries. Cam out to give an account of county by county and his been rightly described as ne of history and learning historical milestone, hav imperishable interest. His passion for any sort of historical lore is not so much concerned with geographical features as with old buildings and persons of distinction, and his chief interest is in the people, their customs, religion and history.

Each of the present volumes has the same prefatory material (30 pages) by Mr Copley, and the same appendix and general bibliography (the latter not being quite as up to date as it should be) of eight pages; and so some 38 pages, a probable average of about 30 per cent of the total, will presumably be reprinted in each volume. For anyone buying a set there will accordingly be much repetitive matter and it is suggested that, for those who would like to have a complete Britannia, a single volume might be printed without repetition of this editorial matter. But Mr Copley says that he has the "general reader" in mind, and clearly he and the publishers are providing for enthusiasts within each county—and a very good provision, too.

The books are excellently produced with illustrations from various sources, and every page is heavily annotated by notes of Gough and others and by those of Mr Copley. This gives the appearance of a work more for the scholar than the general reader, but the notes are often as interesting as the text itself, and both are eminently readable. These will be basic volumes in every collection of county histories.

Frontier to empire

John Crossland

Spain in the Middle Ages. By A. MacKay.
Macmillan £8,95. 333 12816 8. £3.95. 12817 6.

This title fills a gap in our understanding of the evolution of modern Europe. The conquest of much of Spain by the Moors; the reconquista, and its influence on the conquistadores who carried the crusading spirit learned, allied to a lust for gold, into another hemisphere, forms a major theme.

The sub-title "from frontier to empire" is apt; no sooner had Spain emerged from centuries of struggle to push back the frontier against the Moors than, a united kingdom, it found itself at the centre of a vast empire.

Dr MacKay points out that the centuries of seeming isolation from the mainstream of Europe, far from retarding Spain's cultural and spiritual development, probably strengthened it. As "Catholic" Spain it had no illusions about crusading. Not for these frontier people the play-acting at Crusade that characterized the Italian states for instance. Crusading in the Iberian peninsula was a matter of survival. Dr MacKay develops his theme on several levels and the text has useful maps and charts.

Murmurs of war

Noel Hughes

World War Two.
Prelude to War. By Robert Elson and the editors of Time-Life Books.
Blitzkrieg. By Robert Wernick and the editors.
Time-Life Books £5.95 each.

War documentaries have been so successful on television that a fresh crop of illustrated books was only to be expected. Who better-placed to produce them than Time-Life? The pictures assembled are fresh, informative, and laid out and printed with admirable clarity. There is in Prelude to War a stunning colour series of Nazi ceremonial which wonderfully conveys its capacity, especially at midnight, to stir the blood and numb the mind. Blitzkrieg has a fascinating series on acceptable Nazi art with its unwholesome preoccupation with wholesome nude maidens.

Each of the chapters is a fair, balanced and accurate account of its theme. Too many of them open with journalistic contriving ("After the harsh winter, it was one of the loveliest springs that anyone could remember. As evening fell pleasantly over Berlin on May 9, two friends met . . ."). I can sympathize with anybody who squirms at the use of "retread" to describe a first-war soldier recalled to the colours for the second; and I squirmed myself to read that Erich Leinsdorf had been hired to conduct at the Met "sight unseen". These are the blemishes.

Where the volumes fall down, surprisingly, is in the organization of the material. Conventional chapters are interspersed with picture essays. The distinction is not always obvious and their sequence is sometimes baffling. Thus one reads in a picture essay of the Russian civil war, before one comes to the account of the Bolshevik revolution in a conventional chapter. But it is in failing to avoid the obvious traps in designing books in which pictures dominate that the enterprise is weakest. There is a wholly inadequate discussion of the economic causes of World War Two — presumably because such issues are not easily illustrable. Yet a rather good picture of rioting in Calcutta in 1931 makes an odd appearance in Prelude to War. Is it seriously pretended that the political aspirations of the Indian sub-continent (important though they were) were among the significant causes of the 1939-45 War? (The caption is misleading. The "British" police said to be seen quelling the riot are plainly outnumbered by Indian police.)

But perhaps the most serious omission is any adequate discussion of American responsibility for the Second World War. What the Germans, the French, the British and the Italians did to cause it was photographed and is here shown. What the Americans did — sunk in an isolationist posture which their immature diplomatic service could hardly be expected to disturb — was nothing; and that is more difficult to photograph. But American isolationism must bear a far greater responsibility for the war than, for instance, the sordid, but essentially petty adventuring of Mussolini.

More volumes are promised. With a little more thought and tighter editorial control, they could be very good.

Seagoing farmers

Tom Corfe

The Vikings in Britain. By H. R. Loyn.
Batsford £5.95. 7134 0293 8. £2.75. 7134 0294 6.

Henry Loyn's treatment of his subject is in sonata form, rather than the Wagnerian approach more usual in Viking books. Opening theme: seagoing farmers on the verge of a technological breakthrough. Second subject: a politically divided but cultured and prosperous island people. Each is clearly and economically delineated. The two subjects combine in an explosive, dramatic passage, followed by a mellow, reflective coda to elucidate the harmony emerging from the discord.

Professor Loyn orchestrates with an assured touch. His interpretation is sober and balanced, eschewing colourful detail, as he picks his way judiciously through controversial passages of narrative and analysis. Did Danish influence produce the freer peasantry of northern England, or did that pattern reflect pre-Scandinavian influences? "On balance it does seem desirable not to swing to an extreme", says Professor Loyn in a characteristic conclusion.

"A thorough enrichment of the community" is his verdict on the Scandinavian impact; and (to revert to the musical theme) how pleasant to learn that Treorchy Male Voice Choir and Huddersfield Choral Society may owe their prowess to common Scandinavian ancestry.

The Normans in Sicily and Southern Italy. Lincei Lectures 1974. Edited by C. N. L. Brooke.
Cambridge University Press £3.00. 19 725965 0.

In 1967 John Julius Norwich wrote in the preface of his book The Normans in the South that it was the complete lack of modern work in English that spurred him on to produce his study of Norman Italy. Since then the importance of this field has been widely recognized. These Lincei lectures show three aspects of specialist investigation into particular problems.

Ovidio Capitani examines some of the themes in the Norman chroniclers of the south; Giuseppe Galasso examines the political and social changes that the Normans instigated; and Roberto Salvini looks at some of the splendid Norman building which lies half-forgotten in southern Italy.

Politics in the Age of Cobden. By John Prest.
Macmillan £7.95. 333 22349 7.

Although there are a number of historians who have emphasized the importance of the registration of voters in British politics during the 1830s and 1840s, such issues as the first Reform Act and its consequences or the Repeal of the Corn Laws continue to be studied and recounted in the traditional manner, without much reference to this technical aspect of the political game. But John Prest sets out to show us that we should pay more attention to the registration conflict.

Everyone knows that in France, at approximately the same time, when some men had the vote and most did not, then a political group could hope to gain success by ensuring that all its supporters were properly registered, while denouncing those opponents who were registered illegally. This process has often been seen as an example of centralized administrative power. But in Britain the same principle held. As described in this book, the political conflicts which existed in the constituencies between 1832 and 1847 expressed themselves as a continuous registration battle, and although the number of constituencies affected

Cornish community

A Victorian Village. By Mary French.
Glasney Press (Falmouth) £4.50. 9502825 61.

This is as much an oblique commentary on our way of life today as it is a detailed revelation of what was happening in the village of Quethiock, a community in East Cornwall about the turn of the century and later.

Until 1919, when the death of the squire caused the 28 farms to be auctioned, the social structure and cohesion had hardly changed since medieval times. The author, a member of one of the families dispossessed by the sale, sees the disintegration thus begun as a matter of global concern. From personal acquaintance with the village I can endorse this view. Self sufficient and reliant communities have been ousted in exchange for dubious industrial and economic targets of "growth".

The information was gathered from official and personal documents, from the Cornish Times and, above all, from villagers living there at this time. Fully aware of his responsibility to his tenants, his workpeople and his land, the squire showed generosity both in times of hardship and celebra

Mr and Mrs Gladstone: An Intimate Biography. By Joyce Marlow.
Weidenfeld and Nicolson £6.95. 297 77150 7.

Miss Marlow adds new emphases but no new facts to her account of a pair who will not be properly understood until the Gladstone diaries are fully released for publication—and perhaps not even then.

Despite the title, the many prostitutes whom Gladstone set out to meet take up almost as many pages as his wife. Mrs Gladstone was, of course, aware that her husband was given to walking at night among the night-walkers, but accepted, it seems, the honourableness of his intentions, actively assisting him to reclaim certain of them from vice. Gladstone declared to Stephen, the son who was a priest, that he had "never been guilty of the act which is known as that of infidelity to the marriage bed". These sound carefully chosen words. But his interest in "fallen women" amounted to a dangerous addiction.

The long lives of the Gladstones cover the greater part of the nineteenth century. The biographer has to decide how much to lan Lloyd has tackled his vast complex subject in an admiry businesslike way, keeping his ur moving on the wider political canvas while highlighting the campaigns and putting them in their context. Writing to the brief of the series "British at War" he properly gives the greatest weight to this side of the period, but he works in much necessary subject matter on the social background and consequences of the protracted strife.

Actual strife broke out, in fact, very intermittently. The combatants would call periodic truces or sign treaties when economic exhaustion or a pandemic like the Black Death dictated it. The inflation and social evils attendent on the war are given proper weight and not the least interesting aspect of the book are the details given of medieval war finance. English strategy, for example, was dictated by Edward III's inability to meet the costs of maintaining a standing army. It consisted of launching deliberately destructive raids on France designed to weaken the enemy's morale and his capacity to continue the war, but also, and as an extension of the latter, to make the rich French lands actually support the armies.

The English, of course, enjoyed an enormous advantage. Their quarrel with their Gallic neighbours coincided with the domination of the battlefield by a deceptively simple weapon—the long bow—the yeoman's Sunday exercise; tall as himself and needing every ounce of his strength to draw it. As a contemporary doggerel put it:

By Bow and arrows since the war began
Have Englishmen, as it is read in story, on her enemies had many great victory

Great victories there were, won because of the French reluctance to learn by their mistakes; at Poitiers for example, King John sent his knights against the Black Prince in the September heat dismounted after the debacle suffered by them at Crecy. He didn't realize that they made just as fine a target dismounted as they had done mounted.

The Hundred Years War has always seemed to me a very good example of the chauvinistic approach to history. Alan Lloyd redresses the balance and sets the record of the French hero Duguesclin, with his ultimately successful Fabian tactics, against that of the Black Prince. The latter suffers somewhat in the comparison.

The English won the battles but the French, inevitably with the growth of national consciousness (Joan of Arc or not) had to run out victors. Another point the author makes is that the conflict was never purely Anglo-French in character. Many of the most gallant soldiers in the English ranks were Gascons, fighting for their feudal lord, who the English king was, or Bretons. Later Agincourt was won partly because the Burgundians failed to support the French side.

A case for rebellion

e Revolt of the Peasantry 1549.
y Julian Cornwall.
outledge and Kegan Paul £6.50.
100 8676 8.

This is an exciting and rewarding book. Dr Cornwall has already achieved a large reputation as an economic historian, and he has now added to it a detailed study of the ownership of armour and other information gleaned from musters, a good understanding of theology, and a desire to tell a coherent narrative. The result is an impresive effort to interrelate different historical disciplines. For example, Dr Cornwall the demographer is able to point out the large risk involved in the clause in the 1549 Prayer Book urging that baptism of new-born children should be deferred till the next Sunday or holy day.

At the beginning of the book, he oists his historiographical colours o the mast. He is uninterested in eneral theories of revolution, and not prepared to construct general odels of peasant protest before has attempted to reconstruct a ailed narrative of what ppened. It is this detailed narra-ive which constitutes the core of s book, and it has many exciting
w things to say. A full narrative nges the picture of the Western bellion more than that of Kett's bellion. Drawing on Dr Goring's rk, as well as his own, he phasizes the exceptional quantity
armour owned by non-gentlemen in Cornwall, and, with the aid of a detailed reconstruction of the rebels' numbers and equipment, claims that the Western Rebellion was "much the most serious of the century". He makes a strong case for this proposition: it would be interesting to hear him dispute it against Dr Loades's case for Wyatt's Rebellion.

He firmly insists on the religious character of the Western Rising, in contrast to the primarily economic and social complaints of Norfolk. He also answers a question which has puzzled historians for a long time: why did protests about enclosure reach their height at a time when comparatively little enclosure was taking place? Dr Cornwall the demographer supplies a blindingly simple answer: land hunger. As he reminds us, contemporary complaints of enclosure are combined with complaints of engrossing: in times of land hunger, it is the large farm which is the target. The influenza epidemic of 1556-57 is put forward as having provided a possible end of the main cause of sedition.

It is tempting to go on listing the challenging points in this book: it is to be hoped that Dr Cornwall will develop them further. He has achieved his ambition of writing a book ideal for sixth formers, yet novel and exciting for colleagues. However, having done so almost without footnotes, he must expect to be bombarded with letters from colleagues, asking eagerly "where did you find this?"

Architekton

Greek Architects at Work. By J. J. Coulton.
Paul Elek £7.50. 236 40067 3.

In this informative and extensive study Dr Coulton (lecturer in classical archaeology at Edinburgh University) considers not only the design of Greek buildings, but also examines the role of the architekton, the traditions in which he worked and his solutions to many problems of structure and technique.

Despite 11 good plates, many figures and maps and a style which is exact and readable, this is no plain man's guide. It demands an understanding of the architect's work and a familiarity with Egyptian, Greek and Sicilian buildings. Nevertheless, expert and layman alike will appreciate the careful answers to such questions as "How was an unbroken outline achieved for columns built of separate blocks?", "How was the cantilever used in the construction of freizes?" and "What kind of contracts were drawn up for monumental buildings?", and they will admire the clarity with which Dr Coulton presents the ideals of patronage which inspired Greek architecture.

Michael Jessett on the history of the guitar

Guitars: Music, History, Construction and Players from the Renaissance to Rock. By Tom and Mary Anne Evans.

Paddington Press £10.95. 448 22240 X.

The history of most musical instruments is surely interesting enough but that of the guitar is truly fascinating. Over the past 400 years or so it has been subject to the pressures of competing with its cousins the lute and the vihuela, tolerating relatively drastic structural changes and, overall, suffering the fickle whims of musical fashion.

The form of the classical guitar as we know it today was established as recently as the 1850s, and well before the turn of the century it had given birth to the first of a whole family of instruments which were to adapt themselves more and more to the social and artistic requirements of such musical forms as folk, jazz and pop, while at the same time keeping its own "classical" integrity.

Tom and Mary Anne Evans's aim to tell us about the music, history, construction and players of all types of guitar from the medieval to the modern "specially modified Gibson stereo guitar" is highly laudable in itself. I believe it is the first book of its kind to attempt such an undertaking and it is most timely, for there has been for some time now a growing inclination among (especially classical) guitarists to come to terms with styles outside the scope of their habitual practice. While the crossfertilization of idioms that may ensue is not necessarily always successful, the broader and deeper understanding of other musical forms and the enthusiastic study of different techniques at least prepares the player to accept interesting and unorthodox innovations.

Within 480 pages, the book deals with the classical, flamenco, steel-strung, acoustic and electric guitars, their development, construction, repertoire, social history and the people who play them. The layout (although not necessarily the design) of the book is well thought out and the writing is intelligent and direct, giving one the feeling that no unsubstantiated myth could possibly survive the keen research of the authors. There is no mention here of ancient Hittite "guitars", nor any attempt to delve beyond the evidence of the writing and sculpture of thirteenth to fourteenth-century Spain.

There is instead the obvious but nonetheless sensible statement that the history of the guitar before this period is somewhat speculative: instead of wasting our time with mere hearsay the basic mechanical principles of all cordophones are briefly but usefully described in the book's introduction.

The classical guitar has the longest history of the instruments discussed and the authors' logical approach to its development within each period is clearly and separately dealt with. There is an ample introduction to each section, followed by one of the best features of this book, a lavish picture gallery which is a delight to wander through, recognizing old favourites and welcoming many new additions. There are good notes to each of the illustrations and the sections which deal with construction, music, social history and players abound with excellent reproductions and photographs. Particularly interesting are the pictures of guitar making, both by hand and in the factory. The book also contains a sensible glossary, good footnotes and an excellent bibliography.

The dust-cover claims that the book will interest anyone who has anything to do with the guitar—amateur, scholar or professional musician: certainly I have learned from it and it will have a valuable place on my shelves as one of the best reference books on the guitar to have been written. Perhaps it is as yet not quite definitive in its coverage of all aspects of the guitar: for example, there rather too short chapter guitar in Latin America. mention could be made of sheer vitality of this conti attitude towards the guitar role as a popular folk instru and how this style has so fully influenced classical pla there. It is a little odd, too, some acknowledgement of the native virtuosity of such players Atahualpa Yupanqui and Ed Falu is omitted.

It is particularly appropriate in a book dealing with all of guitar mention should be of Roland Harker who, more most other guitarists, played ranging from pop to the mo classics, who was equally skilf both the electric and classical and at home both in the studi on the concert platform. He quite recently not long after late lamented Peter Sensier, of whose instruments are illustra and whose ever helpful advice acknowledged at the beginning this book. Both are irreplace both as musicians and as frie

Choice of Careers Booklets

The more recent booklets in this series are in a new format designed to be more attractive and readable. The booklets are intended to provide young people with the necessary facts on which to base an informed choice of career. They therefore concentrate more on describing the life-style and working environment of people employed in particular occupations, and less on details of work performed, industrial processes, etc. The booklets will be of interest to older persons, and to parents and teachers.

Here are just two examples:

Choice of Careers No 42: Dietetics
'The discovery that there are vitamins in certain foods which are essential to health was not a straightforward one, and even today many people are more concerned with eating quantities of food ('getting a square meal') than with making sure they enjoy a balanced diet.
ISBN 0 11 885304 X 50p(59½p)

Choice of Careers No 96: Dentistry
The development of dentistry into a modern scientific profession started during the nineteenth century, when men began to realise that, besides practical skill, a dentist required a fundamental knowledge of the structure, functions and diseases of the teeth and jaws. Until then dentistry was primarily a mechanical craft and most sufferers from dental disease were at the mercy of 'tooth-drawers'.

Michelangelo, by Howard Hibbard (Penguin £2.75). When Brancusi rejected Michelangelo's work as "Beefsteak!", he was voicing an already growing opposition of taste. By 1975 the 500th anniversary of the Renaissance master's birth must have seemed an almost impossible time at which to write an account of his work. Unless contemporary sensibility be ignored, how could anyone reconcile Michelangelo's world with that of Brancusi and Mondrian, let alone that of Duchamp or Jackson Pollock?

That Howard Hibbard in several ways succeeded was not because he chose to gloss over the central passion of Michelangelo's life. On the contrary, the suggestion which unfolds through the book is that the heavy literary, iconographic meanings that saturate Renaissance art were increasingly stripped away as Michelangelo's obsession, the male nude, became employed as a vehicle capable of realising what Hibbard calls, "a kind of abstract musical dream-language of art."

The independence of the artist and the appreciation of his art as an expression of his ideas—art as art—were conditions first accepted in Michelangelo's day, and very largely because of him. It is on this abstract, intellectual level that Hibbard is able to write what has already been called, "the best summary of Michelangelo's life and achievement written in the English language"—and to make it relevant to us now.

Michael Clarke

Marie Curie, by Robert Reid (Paladin £1.95). It is rare to find a biography such as Robert Reid has written of Marie Curie in which there is so little interest in the inner life of the subject. He clearly dislikes everything about her: the hypochondria, the neuroses, the lack of fun and maternal interest in anything other than the intellectual life of her children. He does not wish to delve any deeper. If there are heroes in this book then they are those that she traditionally overshadows: Pierre to whom he gives the credit for much of the creative scientific work; and her American journalist friend "Missy" who put the energy into raising funds for scientific investigation while she acted simply as the public figure.

But his main interest in choosing her as a subject is clear. As a scientist himself he is fascinated by the workings of the scientific élite at the turn of the century. Their methods, societies, problems and competitions to receive the laurels are described in a degree of detail that brings them to life while Marie remains a black figure passing through them. Her feminist struggle and the tragedy of the destructive effects of her discovery of radium on her physique provide little more than an emotive framework on which to hang the rest.

John Calvin, by T. H. L. Parker (Lion Publishing £1.95). "Calvinism" is a term which has been tossed about like a beach ball by critics playing truant from their books. One dares to hope that this biography by the impressively equipped Dr Parker may be a sounding bell recalling to sobriety some of Calvin's ignorant traducers. Many may be surprised that his sermons were "not severely logical lectures on the sovereignty of God and predestination" but "luminous with theological sense and lively with wit and imagery". The material is chronologically handled, from the Noyon childhood to the education in classics and law and the Strasbourg pastorate sandwiched between the stormy Genevan years.

Though the emphases are primarily theological, glimpses of the man himself are given in paragraphs on Calvin at home and as a correspondent; and not least in the painful maladies in spite of which he pursued his unwavering course.

Calvin's theology is surveyed in a chapter built upon his Institutes of the Christian Religion. Of this brilliant work, produced when he was 26, Calvin blandly comments in his prefatory address to King Francis I of France, that "it is only a kind of rudiments". A modern reader of the Institutes might speculate upon the writer's possible contributions to some recently televised Christological debates. Current religious negativism prompts one to welcome Dr Parker's work as an encouragement to the increasing interest in Reformation studies and the importance of John Calvin.

Review letter

Sir,—I feel I must write to correct the severely misleading impressions given of John Shepherd's work in Malcolm Troup's review of Whose Music: A Sociology of Musical Languages (30 December). Dr Troup suggests that Shepherd subscribes to an evolutionary theory of musical development. Shepherd, however, makes it abundantly clear that he is doing nothing of the sort. Rather, Shepherd argues that whilst there is some traceable historical continuity in both social and musical terms within a given society (surely impossible to deny), this does not imply an evolutionary theory of music: "it should be re-emphasized that music does not possess its own internal laws".

Dr Troup also wrongly implies that Shepherd is critical of pre-literate man for his "lack of control over knowledge", when Shepherd makes it quite explicit that he is presenting a sociological description in Western terms as a point of comparison. Shepherd's statement "and in Western terms he exercises relatively little control" begs the question as to whether the criticism should be made of pre-literate man or of our Western set of assumptions.

The term "heterophony" is open to wider definitions than that quoted by Troup from Grove. Indeed, Wilfrid Mellers' definition in the glossary of Caliban Reborn would seem to be equally satisfactory to that of Grove and is quite compatible with that given in the Appendix of Whose Music? However, what is in dispute here is not so much the definition of heterophony but that of mutuality, which Shepherd is using in a specific sense made clear in chapter three.

Finally, Troup's statement that Whose Music? attempts to "judge our Western literate musical tradition from a 'Third World' standpoint" is exactly the reverse of the theoretical position taken quite explicitly by Shepherd, namely: "Any particular kind of music can only be understood in terms of the criteria of the group or society which makes and appreciates that music". In other words different musical "languages" require different criteria of evaluation and any attempt to judge the music of one society from the standpoint of another is totally misguided.

Malcolm Troup writes:

Sir,—It may be some consola Trevor Wishart to know th criticizing one of John Shepher tools, which I describe as a sort of evolutionary paradigm, I am to bla condemning or misinterpreting nature of the job these youngster have set themselves. What I'm suggesting, however, is that, instead of his waging a rearchaic campaign w the politicization of plainchant Charlemagne won long ago, why n lay out his history horizontally (ethnographic) space than vertically (historical) time. (My complaint to Shepherd's definition of het phony was only to show how his cal hindsight shores up his thesi "mutuality" as easily by medi secular heterophony, properly u stood, as by sacred monophony.

After all, Shepherd's stated tion is to explore "the musical co lation of social-intellectual struc and frameworks in different societ Perhaps in introducing Third-W perspectives, for which Wishart r bukes me, I have mistaken the in tion for the deed (what with She herd's paper chase of non- and p literate allusions). Whose Music? is only Shepherd's Music; it is Wishar and Graham Vulliamy's as well a both of them deal effectively w Third World ghettoes in our p industrial midst.

One fears that Wishart, by dwell on a quotation with which the bo begins and his own letter finishes, m inadvertently have called attention the knots into which Shepherd h tied himself from the start: "Any particular kind of music. . ." D refutes Shepherd's later intention quoted above as surely as it de the whole principle of acculturation.

Do Shepherd and Wishart really w to create the state of musical apartheid in a pluralistic society which such categorical imperative implies? I prefer to think of it in good ol American slang as being "strictly the birds": and even they wo disown it citing the example of al tions of human musicians from the monks of Reading Abbey singing "cuckoo" down to Messiaen's oiseau, all shortly to be struck of the register by Shepherd for having dared to "appreciate" birdsong despite the fact that they were hearing only one hundredth part of what a bird hears and, until quite recently without any inkling of its internal "criteria".

WILLIAM JONES discusses techniques and equipment for sound recording

Most teachers and children now accept tape recording as part of everyday classroom life. Many can manipulate the recording controls with skill. Yet, far too many are still not achieving satisfactory results either because they have not had the opportunity to acquire the small amount of "know-how" necessary to perfect their basic recording techniques, or because they are using inappropriate equipment.

There are, of course, those who are happy to accept this, but for those who wish to improve here are a few points which should result in a dramatic rise in standards.

First, read the makers' handbooks. These give invaluable information on the types of headphones, external loudspeakers and microphones which are compatible with the machine. A particular brand or type of recording tape will also be recommended.

It is pointless to pay extra for expensive chromium dioxide or ferric chrome tape if the manufacturer specifies cheaper low noise ferric oxide tape. The results will be inferior to those obtainable with the cheaper make, and parts of the machine may wear out more rapidly.

Next, improve the recording technique. Recordings made from a radio or record player should be made via an interconnecting wire or lead instead of just by placing a microphone in front of the source of the sound. If the tape recorder and radio handbooks do not specify the type of lead required, why not contact your authority's media resources centre, audio-visual aids centre, teachers' centre, local audio-visual aids group (address registered at the National Audio-Visual Aids Centre), or even the technician at a local secondary school?

When a suitable lead has been obtained it should be labelled to indicate what purpose it serves and each end should be marked with the name of the appropriate machine. It should then be coiled round a cable tidy, which will be available from many electrical stores. It should be kept with the machine, or better still, on a clearly labelled hook in the store cupboard.

Recordings made with a microphone will be more satisfactory if the microphone is placed on a suitable stand (often supplied) rather than held. If a proper stand is not available, lumps of plasticine or bean bags may be moulded to form a cradle.

The importance of keeping a microphone and cable fixed in position during a recording cannot be over-emphasized. Movement will result in unwanted clicks, pops or roaring noises which can completely obscure the recorded programme. If it is impossible to keep the microphone still, a machine with a built-in microphone might be the answer.

Instructions about the distance between microphone and speaker should be indicated in the tape recorder handbook, but if no information is available, then a distance of 12 to 18in should be tried. Even cheap microphones can be very sensitive, and it is usually best to place the machine away from the microphone, preferably on another table.

Do not forget to turn off the tape recorder's loudspeaker or to turn down the volume control while recording or the sound from the loudspeaker will enter the microphone.

The last point for improving recording quality is maintenance of the machine itself. The outside of the machine and the tape deck should be kept free from dust by wiping regularly with a piece of linen or soft leather. The recording head, rubber pressure roller, capstan, etc, can also be cleaned using one of the proprietary brands of tape recorder cleansing kits.

25 YEARS IN VISUAL AIDS

Past Founded in 1952, Diana Wyllie Ltd. began life as an independent filmstrip production company. We are still independent—even in these days of mergers, take-overs and financial cutbacks.

To filmstrips we added slides and, later, tapes. Consideration of our own storage and retrieval needs (yes, we know the problem first hand) led to the development of our DW VIEWPACK SLIDE FILING SYSTEM.

Present A reviewer once wrote of our early filmstrips: "Few in number but every one a gem!"

We continue to cut and polish our gems. Today we offer our visual aids in three formats: half frame filmstrips, full frame filmstrips or mounted slide sets. All have comprehensive printed notes and recent titles also have cassette commentaries.

Our titles keep up with the times and range through Architecture, Crafts, Science, Meteorology, Natural History, Safety and—our speciality—Environmental Studies.

February 1978 has seen the introduction of our most important audio visual programme:— three tape-slide sets or filmstrips on the history, technology, economics and philosophy of NUCLEAR POWER.

The DW VIEWPACK SLIDE FILING SYSTEM has expanded to embrace almost every form of audio visual software and can house and protect slides, filmstrips, film loops, negatives, prints, tapes, cassettes, records and OHP transparencies. DW Viewpacks have become the most popular storage system for slides in the United Kingdom today. Multi-media cabinets and Lightboxes are also in our range.

Future The faithfulness of our old-established users and the enthusiasm of our new ones all over the world are helping to ensure that we can continue to serve your interests in the production, storage and distribution of audio visual software and equipment.

Our 1978 Brochures illustrate our complete range of products, which include several NEW items:— filmstrips/slide sets; a fast slide-mounting kit; a Viewpack 48P and a folding Viewpack 50; also an improved DW VIEWBOX (colour corrected).

such as the BASF "Checkpoint" Tape Head Cleansing kit (80p plus VAT).

Where a cassette recorder has a recording head that is difficult to reach use a special cleaning cassette—BASF "Checkpoint Cleaning Cassette" (76p plus VAT). The tape recorder handbook should indicate how often the machine should be cleaned, but in case of doubt clean at least once every two weeks. It will also be necessary to have your recorder checked and serviced by a qualified technician once a term if it is to perform reliably.

Recordings for future use should be stored away from radiators or other sources of heat. They should not be left near loudspeakers. Tapes which have not been taken out of the library for use, should be placed in a tape recorder every month or so and wound through the machine on fast forward and then back on fast rewind. This will prevent "print through" which is a condition of deteriorated recording resulting from one layer of tape affecting an adjacent layer after being pressed together for too long.

Cassettes can be protected from accidental erasure during use by removing the two tiny tabs on the back. With the tabs knocked out, it is generally impossible to press down the record button when the cassette is in the machine. The cassette can eventually be re-used by sticking adhesive tape over the holes before use.

If the quality of the recording seems reasonable on playback at low volume but becomes distorted when played back at the volume level necessary to reach a group or class, it may be possible to use an external loudspeaker of suitable quality and impedance rating. Again, the manufacturer's handbook should help. If not, it is likely that a firm supplying audio equipment specifically for educational use will be able to advise.

Excellent loudspeakers may be obtained from Goodsell, starting at £12.91 plus VAT for the P10 classroom unit; Coomber Electronic Equipment Ltd (starting with the F10 at £14.46) and Clarke and Smith Manufacturing Company Ltd.

Teachers seeking louder sound levels than can be obtained using their present equipment in conjunction with an external speaker, may find that an amplified loudspeaker is the answer. Most schools would find it useful to have at least one amplified loudspeaker in their audio-visual aids store room.

Some of these pieces of equipment also have facilities for plugging in a microphone which will enable the unit to be used as a public address system. The Coomber 209 amplified loudspeaker costs £39.95, and their 210 model with public address facilities costs £52.23. Goodsell market the SAS basic Amplified Loudspeaker at £35.23, which is rated at 10 watts output compared with the Coomber 209 at 15 watts. The LAS 20 watt unit with mixed inputs for microphone and cassette playback is marketed by Goodsell at £50.44.

Where it is impractical to link external speakers or amplified loudspeakers to existing equipment the answer must be to purchase a tape recorder which is capable of a high output without additional help. Coomber market the 340 series of cassette recorders. Type 341 Cassette Tape Recorder, with 4.5 watt amplifier, is suitable for classroom use, while Type 343 Cassette Tape Recorder, with 15 watt amplifier and 10 in. loudspeaker, could be used effectively in many school halls. Type 341 sells at £86.21 (excluding VAT) and Type 343 costs £96.21 (excluding VAT). These cassette recorders may also be purchased with built-in VHF radio at extra cost.

An alternative would be the basic Goodsell Cassette Recorder Type CTR3/5 with a 5 watt amplifier. This model costs £75.00 (excluding VAT) and features both Jack plug and Din plug sockets whereas many other manufacturers provide only Din sockets. This extra provision can be a great advantage where the rest of the school equipment is a mixture of makes that have accumulated over the years, as linking the machines together becomes easier. This machine would be suitable for use in small to medium classrooms.

Especially recommended is the Goodsell Cassette Recorder CTR 3/12 at £93.82 (excluding VAT). This very reliable machine can be used in classrooms as it stands but it ought to be used with an external loudspeaker if it is desired to use its full 12 watts. The CTR 3/12 has mixed microphone and auxiliary inputs so that music or sound effects can be faded in and out over the speaker's voice.

For use in larger areas the Goodsell Combination Unit CUB at £120.75 (excluding VAT) would be worth considering. This has a 20 watt amplifier and cassette recorder combined in one unit and offers mixed microphone and auxiliary inputs.

Many teachers find that cassette recorders designed for educational use do not look as stylish as their domestic counterparts. This styling difference is to be expected as domestic machines are not made to stand up to the rigours of classroom use. However, where looks and portability are desirable, or battery-mains operation must be offered, the Bell and Howell Educator Series could prove useful for group or individual study. These machines are exceptionally sturdy. The Educator 3085X costs approximately £69.95 (excluding VAT) from various agencies, who will usually give a 20 per cent discount to educational establishments.

The Clarke and Smith 1068 Compact Cassette Radio Recorder, designed to meet the needs of education but retaining a "domestic" appearance, will give 3.5 watt output power on mains and .75 watt on batteries. At £90.75 (excluding VAT) the 1068 has proved itself an excellent teaching aid.

BASF and Sony also provide a range of machines which, while best known on the domestic market, have been thoroughly tested, with effective results, in small group use in schools. These machines, however, still cost more than many schools are prepared to pay.

Many teachers tend to look around electrical and leisure equipment chain stores, trying to pick up bargains at £20 to £30. It would pay them to contact a small audio-visual aids supplier, such as Specialist Audio Visual of Greenwich, who often have lines which are available to educational establishments at prices far below those charged on the domestic market. Many of the specialist suppliers can also maintain and repair machines.

An example of the models available in this way is the Sanyo M3000G. SAV were recently marketing this recorder to education authorities at about £22 which compares favourably with £30-plus which would be paid to a normal retailer. The Sanyo M3000G seems to be an excellent "snip" at this price. Facilities offered include mains-battery operation, public address facility, din in-out, built-in microphone, provision for external microphone and remote control (recommended extra) and provision for earphone and external speaker. Naturally the performance is not in the hi-fi class, but for the price it serves well for individual, small group or mobile use.

Finally there are the "reel to reel" tape recorders (also known as "open spool" or "spool to spool"). Although cassette recorders seem to predominate in schools, every school would find it useful to have at least one reel to reel machine. This type makes editing much simpler and offers extended recording time. A 7in spool of triple play tape at 1⅞ would be enough to record an entire day's BBC schools broadcasts from 9 am to 3 pm with tape to spare for an emergency. If it is accepted that schools will be concentrating on cassette recorders for classroom use and will reserve the reel to reel machine for more serious recording, while maintaining the option to use it in the classroom occasionally, then the Tandberg Series 15 is the obvious choice. This very reliable machine is available in two and four track models and is offered either in a portable form (mains only) or free standing in a cabinet. It offers excellent sound quality with 7in reel capacity, mixed microphone and auxiliary inputs and three tape speeds, 1⅞, 3¾ and 7½ ips. Though the price of around £180 through educational suppliers may seem high compared with the prices of the cassette recorders mentioned, the Tandberg Series 15 is an excellent buy.

Nursery archive

by Carolyn O'Grady

Six months ago the National Froebel Foundation and the Manpower Services Commission donated premises and money respectively for the setting up of an Early Childhood Archive. The impressive amount of work which has resulted during this time was recently displayed at an exhibition at the Institute.

The archive so far includes information on individuals and organizations with an interest in the education of young children; indexes of nurseries, nursery schools and classes, nursery centres and playgroups; and lists of libraries, archives and museum collections, which include material of relevance to early childhood education. There is also information on courses relating to young children, including the Open University courses on parenthood.

The archive staff have visited [illegible] nursery schools throughout the country which they considered representative of different types of nursery school, and collected photographic and documentary materials on each one. The schools include a Montessori nursery school, a community school, one on a roof top and a Housing Association nursery school.

There is a large amount of material relating to innovators within the nursery movement, especially Froebel; and the beginning of a collection of educational apparatus and materials. The archive is also compiling a collection of photographs which, it is considered, shed light on current educational practice.

Barbara Bampton, head of the research team, sees four main uses for the archive. First, for research into topics relating to early childhood – past and present; second, for students on, for example, NNEB courses (many lecturers on these courses have welcomed the archive, she says, because they don't have time to introduce an historical element into them); third, as an information source for parents and others on pre-school education and related subjects; and fourth, as a source of information and teaching materials for lecturers.

Ms Bampton points out that so far as the researchers are aware no organization has attempted to build up such a comprehensive archive of materials and information before, though, of course, aspects of it are to be found in, for example, the Bethnal Green Museum of Childhood and the National Children's Bureau.

With the end of the exhibition the archive has returned to the small room it occupies in the Froebel Institute, but it has a more urgent problem than lack of space. This month the Manpower Services Commission's financial support comes to an end. Because of staff illnesses the archive has been dilatory with its applications to charities and has yet to find another sponsor.

Ed. tech. for the handicapped

Many of the educational aids commercially available for use with the handicapped will be demonstrated at a four-day course on "Educational Technology for the Handicapped Child" at Castle Priory College, Wallingford, from April 3 to 7.

This is the latest in a well-established series of courses on aspects of aids for the handicapped organized by Roger Jefcoate. A freelance consultant-assessor of electronic aids, he has built up a world-wide reputation. The April course is designed to attract teachers, educational psychologists and therapists not only from this country but from overseas.

The Electraid Assessment System, the Lightwriter, Teletype and many other new aids and equipment will be demonstrated and participants will also be able to try them out for themselves.

In addition, during workshop sessions there will be instruction on how to go about making and adapting equipment for particular children.

Roger Jefcoate has organized similar courses for the past three years at Castle Priory in conjunction with the Spastics Society with whom he has particularly close links.

Before deciding to freelance five years ago, he was deputy director of the POSM Research Project at Aylesbury, where in the 1960s he and two colleagues invented the "Possum" typewriter.

He now acts regularly as consultant to virtually every voluntary association in the country concerned with the handicapped, as well as the Department of Employment.

Practical weekends for parents and teachers, which attract between 80 and 140, are another feature of his work. He organizes four or five of these throughout the year, often in special schools, but principally outside London, to underline the fact that the needs of the disabled are spread throughout the country.

His own inventions include a range of simple electronic aids for those not disabled enough to need complex Possum equipment—at economical prices.

They include a sonic torch for operating electorical gadgets by remote control, a two-way household intercom unit and a portable light dimmer switch. They are all made at the Sherrards Training Centre for Spastics at Welwyn Garden City and are available through Newton Aids, 2a Conway Street, London, W.1.

One of his most popular inventions is a Bird Hanger—a simple sucker device with an arm which taps the window whenever a bird comes to feed from it. Retailing for only 20p, it is made at the Banbury Adult Training Centre for the Mentally Handicapped and is available direct from him at Willowbrook, Swanbourne Road, Mursley, Milton Keynes.

For costly, sophisticated equipment, often needed desperately urgently, he has set up the Aidis Trust. Through this he now raises more than £5,000 a year—and as much again directly through rotary clubs and companies, etc.—to provide aids for the disabled quickly. Even if the NHS or social services authorities authorize them, the wheels of administration are often painfully slow to deliver the goods. Whenever they eventually come up with the necessary replacement, the original aid is used for someone else.

New items in the ESA Vital Years 1978/79 catalogue include a new range of musical instruments, new thermometers and additions to the Bulmershe mathematics programme. The Multilink range has been extended with Multilink Activity Cards, markers and a new 100 Tray.

The educational use of museums, ancient monuments and historic houses is the subject of a course at York University from April 2 to 6 which is being organized by the DES with the Education Department of the Ministry of the Environment.

The craft of the stonemason, using a museum, trail making, and Roman York are among the topics for study which will be led by Mr W. Taylor, an inspector of schools and Dr. M. Apted, Assistant Chief Inspector of Ancient Monuments and Historic Buildings.

Teachers and advisers as well as museum staff and historic house owners are being invited to attend. There is no charge for tuition and accommodation is being kept to under £10 a day. TT15 application forms are available from the DES.

The 1978 prospectus of The Family Planning Association Education Unit is now available. It sets out the aims and services provided by the education unit and also lists the three-day courses in sex education and personal relationships.

The association also organizes regional courses and resource days on which it is possible to view new educational materials.

Strangely, there is no photograph of the opening of the first nuclear reactor, an odd omission in a world eager to record moments of historic significance. Afterwards the scene was reconstructed by an artist and viewers of Nuclear Power, the new three-part slide-tape pack produced by Diana Wyllie Ltd, can see his painting.

It is the opening frame in a series that traces the history of man's harnessing of atomic energy, explains the processes used around the world, including Russia, shows some of the risks and discusses the problems posed by waste disposal.

There are 45 slides in each set, together with a half-hour taped commentary and backed with detailed, clearly written notes that do not burke the controversial issues; the author is Dr. Michael Flood. The complete set costs £40.

Bare bones of Shakespeare

Tales from Shakespeare
King Lear
Narrated by Richard Baker
Written by Basil Hope Gibson
Zeus Recording Co Ltd, 52 Montagu Square, London W1

Perhaps I should, as it were, declare an interest. I cannot feel friendly towards the idea of Tales from Shakespeare. I was never partial to Lamb, whose Tales from Shakespeare seemed too close to the original, so much of the phraseology having been lovingly conned from the plays as not to facilitate anything, while the flattening out of Shakespeare's rhythms to accommodate a prose paraphrase seemed a strange homage indeed.

Too close up and too distant at the same time. Lamb fell, for me, between two joint stools. On the other hand, it may be that I came to Lamb too late anyway, and so ended by feeling like Samuel Johnson with a patron encumbered with help I no longer needed.

The present version proceeds on a different principle. It quotes Shakespeare's own words only occasionally, though quotations crowd more towards the end. This is perhaps inevitable, but the terrible extremities of Lear's rage and anguish emerge rather oddly from the firm, plummy composure of Richard Baker's reading. ("Howl, Howl, Howl, Howl . . ."). The result is strange. It relates to Shakespeare as an X-ray photograph of a friend relates to the friend.

When I hear "'This cold night', mutters the Fool, 'will turn us all to fools and madmen'", or "'I killed the slave that was a-hanging thee' [Lear on the death of Cordelia] 'It's true, my lord', said a witness, 'he did'", the indecorum of the conjunction of text and interpolated matter is such that these and similar effects make one feel that those who might be imagined as being helped by the tape are simply not ready for Lear.

Better a blank tape that pupils and imaginative teacher can record bits of Lear on. To surround texts with a wedge of access material is not the way to give unrestricted access. The most positive thing that can be said is perhaps that this is far from being the most virulent kind of secondary material. Still it is mainly another form of what might be called the triumph of secondary material.

TALKBACK

Gillian Klein

It was a recognition of and respect for mother-tongues that motivated the Centre for Urban Educational Studies to hold an exhibition—the first of its kind—of non-English books for children. Realizing that we could not possibly represent all the languages spoken at home by the children in London schools, we limited ourselves to Greek, Turkish, Chinese and five Asian languages: Hindi, Gujerati, Punjabi, Bengali and Urdu.

The 30 or more books, chiefly fiction and folk-tales, in each language, could have meant little to the teachers and librarians who visited the exhibition. But at each of 10 timetabled sessions a mother-tongue speaker, usually a teacher, was present to open up the literature of one of the languages of the visiting group of schoolchildren for whom that language was their mother-tongue.

No observer could have failed to note the delighted response of every child there to hearing stories and handling books written in their home language. The enjoyment of the children who came from more than 50 schools in and outside of ILEA did not surprise us.

What we had not expected was the amount of interest shown by the media, by heads, teachers and public librarians. There seems to be a growing awareness of the need for mother-tongue books, and for the readers who can make this material accessible to children in school.

Many teachers, including those concerned with English as a second language, will argue for linguistic pluralism in our schools. The "bath" theory of language acquisition has been discredited—research in Canada, the United States and Scandinavia, and by Marta Rado in Australia, shows that to "immerse" non-English speakers in this "bath" may be to drown them.

Totally excluding the mother-tongue can retard cognitive development, for children are deprived of the means to relate verbally to their environment, or to express their thoughts. Thus command of their mother-tongue can only assist, not impede, their acquisition of English.

The Co-ordinating Committee for Mother-Tongue Teaching, which is working towards mother-tongue provision in mainstream schools, has expressed its concern for the children of linguistic minorities who "forfeit several years of their conceptual and linguistic development . . . in British schools".

It may take time until teachers can be found to meet the linguistic needs of these children, but leisure reading books which recognize the child's mother-tongue, culture and identity are already available in ethnic bookshops in Britain, and should be used.

A welcome link will be forged between home and school when a parent can read together with a child a book in the language of their home, brought from the school. The school will also be formally acknowledging the value of the child's mother-tongue, itself an essential part of the child's identity.

Our "story-time" demonstrated the worth of children seeing and hearing stories in their own languages, instead of having these languages dismissed as inconvenient or at best unimportant by schools. Recognition and appreciation of the numerous mother-tongues of children is a logical extension of multi-racial education, and a valid contribution to ensuring equal status for all in our multi-cultural society.

Winter sports

Taking a gamble

Robin Mead on self-catering winter sports holidays in Scotland

An innocuous-looking press release from the French Government Tourist Office early last autumn provided the vital clue.

"More Britons will ski in France this winter", the single-page release announced snappily. "Last year, 259,599 Britons skied abroad and one in four of them went to France."

And the question which immediately arose was why all those skiers went to France, a country which is not only still comparatively expensive for British holidaymakers but which also has some of Europe's nastier ski resorts.

No, it was not the new mini-skis—although they may have appealed to a few nervous beginners. France attracted the skiers because the French resorts have taken a big gamble and concentrated massively on self-catering holidays. And the gamble has paid off.

Self-catering, a major growth area as far as summer sunshine holidays are concerned, has now become extremely popular for winter sports holidays too. The trend has been accelerating this winter, and it heralds a major change in holiday habits.

Last winter, for example, fewer than one skier in three from Britain booked their holiday with an inclusive tour operator. No doubt the proportion would have been even lower if the Scottish ski resorts had been included in the figures. And this means that people are choosing to travel by train, coach or private car to reach their destinations, and then preferring to look after themselves rather than go into an hotel.

Why? The answer is nothing to do with freedom of choice and escape from routine, which is one of the factors behind the popularity of self-catering villas and apartments in the summer months. It is to do with money.

It is a common belief that by using the family car to get somewhere, then looking after yourself when you do, you save money. Unfortunately, in nine cases out of 10, that belief turns out to be unfounded.

However many people you cram into a car, you are unlikely to spend less between you on the journey across Europe to the Alps or the Pyrenees than you would on the sort of bargain air fare that tour operators can offer. Your rented rooms will cost more because the owner's agent will see you coming and you cannot drive the sort of bargain that a big holiday company can. You will weaken and eat out; and when you do not you will find that ski resort supermarkets regularly make a killing out of being the one shop for miles around.

There will be no group concessions for lift passes or the hire of equipment, either. You may feel as though you are saving money, but you won't.

The exception to this rule, however, could be Scotland—an increasingly sophisticated skiing area but one which, on the evidence of this winter at least, still has either too much snow or too little.

You take a gamble if you choose a Scottish skiing holiday. Many of the things which, to my mind, make a skiing holiday are often missing—like the occasional hot, sunny day, a big choice of evening entertainment, or the knowledge that however bad the weather you are unlikely to get cut off because the Swiss/French/Austrians/Germans (regrettably, one cannot include the Spanish) are so efficient at clearing blocked roads and railways.

Scotland seems, every year, to be the ski area which is just about to take off. But it never quite makes it.

The growth of self-catering skiing holidays in Scotland could be the answer. For, in the Scottish context, it does somehow seem to be an admission that things may not turn out quite right—and it cuts the price of a holiday down to a point where you can afford to take the gamble.

Schoolchildren and youth parties have been taking that particular gamble for some years, for Scotland is a good area for beginners. Now adults are joining in—prompted by the development of, among other things, a new self-catering hotel at Aviemore, the principal Scottish resort, and the increasing availability of rented cottages in areas like Glenshee.

I view this "cottage industry" with a certain amount of suspicion, having toured the area before the arrival of the winter snows. Skiing in Glenshee is centred on the "resort" of Spittal of Glenshee, and on Cairnwell Pass, which is 1,000 ft above Spittal of Glenshee on the A93 road from Perth to Braemar and is, incidentally, the highest main road pass in Britain. But the "ski cottage to let" signs stretch down the road almost as far as Perth, 40 miles away—and the drive to the ski slopes is not one to look forward to if the weather is bad.

One can have no such reservations about Aviemore—a village which once had a depopulation problem but which now crams in the visitors by the simple device of ensuring that there is plenty for them to do whatever the weather.

Indoor swimming pool, solarium, sauna baths, a theatre, fine shops, a superb range of bars, restaurants, and discos, squash, fishing, canoeing, pony-trekking and go-karting, an artificial ski slope and (not least) excellent road and rail links with the south—Aviemore has them all. It has developed into a good all-year-round resort despite one or two rather dubious recent additions, and is ideal for group or family skiing holidays.

There are some good package deals to Aviemore using rail transport, but if you prefer to make your own way there nobody will mind and the choice and range of accommodation has produced a healthy competitive spirit

In the Aviemore Centre itself there is a choice of ordinary hotels, a motel, or self-catering chalets and apartments with traditional hotel service available on demand. But there are other hotels in the village and the surrounding countryside, and a further selection of privately owned cottages available for rent. The difference here is that the cottages are generally more centrally situated—and you will not get stuck in a snowdrift on your way to the ski slopes.

Of course, you may not find any snow at all—despite the fact that you have a large portion of the Cairngorms in which to look. But, like choosing a self-catering holiday, that is something which has to be left to chance.

School skiing—coaching and competitions

Stan Palmer on a new NSFGB approved coaching scheme that provides for performers, coaches and officials

One of the most significant developments to encourage the further growth of schools' skiing in England and Wales will be the implementation of the Coaching Scheme. This will be administered in England by the English Ski Council and in Wales by the Ski Council of Wales. It has been approved by the National Ski Federation of Great Britain and is supported by the Sports Council.

Lengthy, sometimes seemingly protracted, discussion between John Shedden, director of coaching to the English council, Alan Hughes, chairman of the Welsh coaching committee, and all interested parties has resulted in a "package" that adequately provides for performers, coaches and officials.

With an estimated 70,000 school children visiting the Continent and Scotland in organized school and l.e.a. groups in addition to the many who are now introduced to the sport on artificial ski slopes it was essential to establish a structure that catered for beginners, regional, national and international participants.

The NSFGB junior Alpine ski tests, increasingly popular with school groups, may in the future be taken as a continual assessment test. This will help to ensure that the last session of the ski course may be spent skiing instead of standing in lines waiting to perform techniques. Continental ski schools may be persuaded to adopt this system for all alpine tests.

In May 1976 Schools Abroad Ltd sponsored the first English junior artificial ski slope championships at Rossendale, Lancashire. The event gave great impetus to the establishing of regional ski racing squads with members drawn from existing ski clubs and school clubs. Both the sponsors and the English Ski Council were so pleased with its success that the sponsorship was extended for a further five years.

The championships are now clearly established as the major event of the English calendar. The 1978 championships will be held at the Gloucester Ski Centre on May 13-14. Representatives of ESC have made provisional arrangements for an English schools artificial slope championships to be held at Gloucester in September. Entry will be determined by the results of the regional championships organized by the regional ski associations.

One development following the 1976 championships was the formation of a national junior squad. At first competition was limited to races against Scotland and Wales on artificial slopes. In February 1977 a team of 10, eight boys and two girls, all in full time attendance at school, travelled to Pamporovo, Bulgaria, to compete against a Bulgarian team. The event was sponsored by Schools Abroad Ltd and Balkan Tourist.

Within 10 months of the first championship the basis for very positive developments had been established and proved. It was possible for the interest in skiing started on a school visit or on an artificial slope to lead to participation in national and international events. In just three years Martyn Collin, Gregg Newey, Neil Holmes (Boldmere High School, Sutton Coldfield), Nicola Scott, Ian Ferguson (Southampton SC), Alison and Neil Shepperd (Sandown Park Ski Racing Club) had achieved this and in doing so had raised the aspirations of many youngsters to national and international competition.

Chairlift at Pamporovo where a British schools team are competing.

It is significant that the remainder of the team, Martin Wright, Nigel Morgan and Clive Stanton, whose skiing had developed in the more traditional manner with their families and the established alpine racing clubs, accepted their team colleagues as equals and not as participants in a similar yet different sport.

This year teams sponsored by Schools Abroad Ltd. and Balkan Tourist from England and Wales will be training and competing in Pamporovo from February 22 to March 1.

Fortunately, not everyone who skis has aspirations to be a racer; some find it a suitable vehicle for artistic self expression. Free style skiing, which is perhaps best described as a mixture of Olympic and modern educational gymnastics, dance and ice skating performed while sliding downhill on skis, is becoming increasingly popular and the coaching scheme provides for this aspect of the sport.

Major changes have been made to the coaching awards. To ensure maximum benefit to the pupils it was essential to encourage staff involvement. The coaching awards have now been structured to accommodate the needs of education as well as the ski clubs. A trainee instructor award has been introduced at a lower level than the artificial ski slope instructor's certificate. It will enable school teachers to instruct groups of their pupils in the basic techniques under the supervision of a qualified instructor. They will also be able to conduct NSFGB junior Alpine one-star tests.

It is not intended to replace the existing Scottish National Ski Council ski party leaders award or the British Association of Ski Instructors awards. Teachers wishing to instruct groups of pupils on either local snow or on organized ski courses on snow are recommended to continue to use the excellent training offered by the two organizations.

The artificial ski slope instructor's certificate is retained in the scheme, though at a higher level, requiring a greater technical competence, personal experience on snow and a sound knowledge of the sport. Progression in the scheme will be monitored by the introduction of a logbook in which all courses attended will be entered.

Coaches, who have previously been appointed on the recommendation of a regional ski association with a minimum qualification of BASI3, will in future be required to pass a coach examination. All coaches will be expected to have a knowledge of anatomy and physiology, principles of fitness training and theories of learning. The syllabus will include advanced recreational skiing, Alpine racing and free style. Coaches will be expected to specialize in one of the disciplines.

The final element in the scheme is concerned with the training and qualification of the officials necessary to organize and run the increasing number of events for competitors. It will ensure that the established and accepted rules as determined by the governing body are used at all levels.

The revised ski party organizer's certificate, which it is hoped will more adequately meet the needs of both the inexperienced and experienced school party leaders, has been included in this section of the coaching scheme.

Members of the English Ski Council have arranged sponsorship with Schools Abroad Ltd to produce a series of wall charts and other visual aids that will cover many aspects of the sport. Resource organization packs will be available in March 1978.

Further details of the coaching scheme may be obtained from The Coaching Secretary, English Ski Council, 118 Eaton Square, London SW1W 9AF.

Disasters like the hotel fire at Sappada in 1976 are blessedly rare, nevertheless they do occur. The headmaster of Sherrardswood School describes how the emergency was dealt with at home.

Lessons from a tragedy

By Richard Godsmark

The experience of Sherrardswood School, Welwyn Garden City, in the hotel fire at Sappada, Northern Italy, in 1976, when a member of staff and two boys and three of the hotel staff lost their lives—may be of some help to others planning holidays abroad. It was little short of miraculous that the casualty list was not much greater.

The holiday was booked through a reputable firm which specializes in school skiing holidays. The fire precautions and safety regulations were non-existent. I suspect that the same conditions would have been found in almost any other hotel by parties booking through any travel organization.

It is to be hoped that the lesson has been learnt and that all travel organizations will now insist on higher safety standards and on fire drills by all parties.

My own view is that the most valuable form of safety precaution would be to have a competent night watchman on duty in the hotel. Organizers of groups of girls might well consider the advisability of including men among their staff.

One assumes that any school party arrangements would be made through a reputable travel agent and that parents would be kept fully informed in writing of the arrangements made. The normal insurance cover may be adequate for minor losses, but it certainly is not sufficient for a major disaster in which everything may be lost. Suitcases, handbags, wristwatches, and shoes are much more expensive to replace than one would expect.

At Sappada nothing whatever was recovered apart from odd articles of clothing which children were able to put on as they escaped from the hotel. Most of them returned wearing clothes given to them by the people of Sappada. Children should be discouraged from taking jewelry and expensive cameras.

It is essential that the party leader should leave, with a responsible person, an up-to-date list of party members and the names, addresses and business and home telephone numbers of the persons to be contacted in case of emergency. It is also essential that the person holding the check list (for the sake of simplicity I will refer to him as the headmaster) should have it available twenty-four hours a day, and that his whereabouts should be known to the office of the travel agent.

In our own case the first news of the tragedy was telephoned to me at my home by the travel agent at 6.30 am on the Monday morning. The headmaster must have people available to help him, and must have the use of at least two telephones. In our case it would have been a physical impossibility to contact 40 families in a matter of eight hours with one telephone, and at the same time deal with the conflicting reports from the travel agent and elsewhere.

The headmaster should remain at a telephone and leave emergency travel arrangements in the hands of the travel agent who is in a better better position to arrange emergency flights, etc. We had complete cooperation from the telephone service in obtaining numbers and in interrupting calls, and from British Caledonian Airways and the airport authority at Gatwick.

The biggest problem we had to deal with was the press. Once news of the disaster broke, the press were relentless in their pursuit of the school and the families concerned. With hindsight it is clear that we should have prepared brief biographies together with photographs, of the casualties, and have called a press conference to issue a prepared statement in time for the morning editions.

We did not do this and the daily papers published accounts of the rescue operations which in many cases were pure fiction and caused considerable distress to some of the people concerned. These original stories were presumably filed for reference and now when any paper or magazine wishes to refer to the tragedy, they take out and repeat the original untruths. We found that the BBC and ITV newsreel crews who visited us were much more reliable and cooperative.

In the case of the Sappada disaster there was a tremendous reaction from the public and a number of monetary contributions were received. In such circumstances I recommend that a fund should be opened with a separate bank account and that the terms of the fund should be clearly defined and made known to the public.

It is also advisable that a statement be made as to how long the fund will remain open and that the assets should be disposed of as soon as possible after that date. The public memory is short and what may seem at first to be a national disaster will be forgotten in a matter of days or weeks by all except those closely involved in it.

It may be of interest that several of the children who were rescued from the fire at Sappada have expressed the wish to have another school skiing holiday, and plans are now being made for a party to go abroad next year.

The full account of the tragedy at Sappada is given for the first time in a book to be published next Spring, Sherrardswood 1928-1978, which is the story of the first 50 years of the school.

The way to the top

Lynne Gladstone-Millar

If I ever had any idea that being an international class skier was a glamorous occupation, I have been thoroughly disabused of this notion by Alan Stewart, who skied for Britain in the last Olympics and who has just finished seventh in the overall results—the highest placing a Briton has ever achieved—in the world championships in Garmisch-Partenkirchen.

Alan, a Scotsman with a broad smile and a canny outlook, paints a picture of constant driving long distances from race to race, of living out of suitcases, of no privacy, of the pressures of competition, and of relentless training which is virtually all the year round. Après-ski parties are few and far between, because they are perpetually short of cash. Depressions are not uncommon, caused by a few bad results in a row, or poor weather, or tensions in the team.

Why do people do it? Naturally there must be great personal satisfaction in representing one's country at a sport, but there is something else.

"You get hooked", was Alan's explanation. "You have got this basic skiing inside you, and in the past few years you have put in a fantastic amount of work. It is not the sort of thing you can give up just because you don't feel like doing it one day. It is a much longer decision. Once you have given up, there is no way you can go back again."

How does a young person start on this arduous trail? Parental encouragement is vital, and the attitude of the school to such a talent is all-important.

"I went to a school in Glasgow where if you did not play rugby and cricket you were not 'in'. I did play rugby, and I was always in the team for my year, which meant playing on Saturday mornings. Then this started to conflict with my ski racing when I was 13 or 14. Eventually I refused to play, and went skiing instead, but it was made clear that this was not the done thing to do".

Alan had more problems when he needed time off—only a few days—to go abroad training with the Junior National Racing Group. The school did not think that sufficient reason for missing classes. Only when he became British junior champion did his difficulties evaporate. "But it took an awful lot of work on my part before I got any acceptance of skiing", he said.

Alan Stewart, Innsbruck 1976.

Ideally, Alan believes young people should start skiing as soon as possible, even at three or four years old. A dry ski slope helps and is good to start on, but he feels only a limited standard can be reached on the matting. You must make for the snow.

"Until you start racing seriously at about 15 years old, the basic skiing technique is far more important", he told me. "You don't have to worry about being super fit when you are a child. But you must be taught properly with a

Candles in the snow

Dudley Wilson takes a winter holiday in Sweden

Sweden has the highest standard of living and costs to match. But our pound has perked up, Swedish inflation is under control and the ferry companies are packaging competitively priced holidays to lure British tourists. Some summer prices on Tor Line, for example, are as much as 30 per cent lower than last year.

Innovations this winter have been skiing and self-catering holidays in Varmland. No wonder bookings were heavy in December when the total cost for four of chalet hire, crossings with couchettes and carriage of car came to just £160 (9 nights). Spring prices rise to £228 but this still brings Sweden into the reckoning as one of the cheapest do-it-yourself bases for winter holidays.

As I drove along route 45 from Gothenburg the snows thickened and an evening sun bronzed icy lakes and low fells covered with evergreens. After nightfall a magical white light from strings of lamps on outdoor Christmas trees belonging to homes, churches and communities glistened in the crystal chill. From the windows of houses, mostly painted dark red, glinted candles placed there to guide wayfarers. No country has such a rich array of Christmas customs stretching from St. Lucia's Festival to Twelfth Night. On Christmas Eve Swedish cows, so lore has it, have the power of speech.

No need to worry about chains or winter tyres. The road is kept open but careful driving is essential. Routes are gravelled, salted, cleared and thoroughly maintained. I reached Sunne, my destination, just four hours steady drive after disembarkation. Petrol prices came as a pleasant surprise at less than 80p a gallon.

Visitors to Sunne should begin by calling on the Tourist Bureau, a model of its kind working with and on behalf of the community who pay for it and benefit from its efficient enterprise. Sunne is in Varmland and no welcome could be warmer than that accorded to tourists by Carl-Axel Wieslander and his staff. Hotels used for ski holidays are small, independently owned, modest in appointments but comfortable. Ruth Mard, proprietress and cook at Hotel Sunne, provided an abundance of excellent food often from the smorgasbord buffet. Half board here on a holiday which includes couchettes and carriage of car with four, costs £99.

The ski slopes are five miles away at Finnfallet, a refreshingly uncomplicated centre which has three lifts. Slalom skiing has recently been given a boost in Sweden, rather as skating received here after John Curry's Olympic success, following Ingemar Stenmark's international triumphs. These slopes are admirably suited to beginners, modest practitioners and families who wish to learn and ski together in an atmosphere totally without snobbery or modish display.

You will join Swedes for the most part with a sprinkling of foreigners who are made welcome. Pistes are illuminated for evening skiing. Snow cannon manufacture snow to ensure favourable conditions all winter. In forests above Finnfallet ski touring paths 21, 5 and 10 kilometres long wind through the pines. Most villages have ski trails lit at night some have rinks and there's impromptu cross-country skiing everywhere.

Cross-country equipment can be hired at the Tourist office for about £1.10 daily (£5 weekly). Finnfallet charges £7.30 weekly (£2.70 daily) for downhill slalom ski, stick and boot hire. Lift passes can cost as little as £7.75 weekly and three-hour lessons work out at £6.60 or £20 for six-day courses. Prices for children's lift passes and lessons are about 25 per cent less.

Self-catering chalets are located 14 miles from Sunne, at Sandvikens and Medskog. You can ski-wander from your chalet into adjoining woods or try, as a change from Finnfallet, slopes at Munkfors and Deje, five and a half miles away. Chalets are modern, well furnished, well warmed too and all heating, lighting and cooking charges are included—only linen must be brought. Medskog is a working farm where the owners have built into a barn a children's play area and a cosy get-together room.

Varmland is rich in craftsmen and artists part of that creative regional imagination which produced Lagerlof's stories, Froding's lyrics and the folk music, especially Song of Varmland something of a national anthem hereabouts. I met Gunhild Kulander, an artist of world renown, who lives near Grasmark. Gunhild's intense vision, stimulated by her experiences of Amazonia and Aztec culture, is given shape in this Varmland stillness.

High quality, locally made goods at ungrasping prices make shopping in the valley a delight. Sunne shops stock fine glass and kitchen ware as well as the many-branched candelabra in brass or painted wood which guide travellers from beckoning windows.

A farmer's sled and pony in Varmland.

For independent stays or meals out, Solbacka Gastgiveri is splendidly run by Inge and Hans Lange. Here I parked against the farmer's sled and we danced the New Year in on crisp snow round the Christmas tree as fireworks exploded aginst a sky sparkling with stars.

For comfortable Swedish elegance Lansmansgarden, owned by Anna-Stina and Erik Biorklund, is perfect, exactly what a country house hotel should be.

Rottneros Park must not be missed. Here are superb sculptures from every Scandinavian country sited in a formal park sweeping past banks of rhododendrons to the lakeside. I found Carl Eldh's couple "Youth" and Arvid Knoppel's graceful "Deer" especially satisfying in perfect surroundings.

Contact Tor Line for information on group reductions and all holidays. Their summer brochure contains many attractive ideas. Sunne Tourist Bureau will gladly help with school trips or personal inquiries. There is an excellent youth hostel in Sunne.

If you are self-catering bring food from Britain: you are allowed up to 30lb of tins, tea, coffee, cereals. Buy alcohol on board Tor Line's luxurious vessels which cross from Felixstowe (also from Newcastle this summer) in 21 hours. Avoid drinks out in Sweden, they are ruinously expensive, but wine bought at the State Shop is no more costly than at home.

The Tourist Bureau tells its guests in a weekly bulletin not only what is on in town and valley but also of best buys at supermarkets where remarkable savings on meat can be made. They really do take you into their confidence and thence into the community: thus breaking down that reserve which can be characteristic of both Swedes and British. Remaining reticence is whirled away at the weekly gathering to welcome guests with food, song and the infectious polkas of rural Sweden—a heart-warming event held at Rottneros.

good instructor. You must get the basic skiing technique drilled into you long before you start trying to race. This means hours and hours on the snow, jumping and turning, jumping and turning."

"There should", he continued, "be a lot more money available to set up a training school abroad for young people. To be a top skier you have to ski every day when you are young, no matter what the conditions are."

The next step is participation in one or two races a year—just for fun. "It should still be fun then", Alan insisted. "Well, yes, my skiing is still fun now, sometimes—only sometimes! It is fun when the weather is good, when I feel good, both mentally and physically. Then I actually want to ski and I enjoy it."

To ski at his level, however, a tremendous amount of self-discipline and self-denial is also required. Most of the year he is away from home, based on the Continent. "You can let up a little in May or June, otherwise you train all the year round. In July we start skiing on the glaciers. We get up at 6 am, go for a run, ski from about 8.30 am until noon, and after lunch we go training. This can be varied—either long-distance running up the mountains, playing football or tennis, swimming, circuits, press-ups, and so on, or a whole afternoon in the gym. We have the evening free in the summer, but you are never in bed later than 9.30 pm or 10 pm. None of us drinks, and sometimes it is boring, with little to do in the evening."

This routine goes on mercilessly until the racing season, and then there is a tuning-up of tensions. "You deliberately 'psych' yourself up", Alan said. "Suddenly you have to start racing, and all evening long beforehand you are preparing your skis and the whole atmosphere is tensed up a bit. The trainer puts his foot down harder, turns the screw up half a notch more. Then you are moving around from place to place, always unpacking, going into a new bedroom, sharing with one or two others, racing perhaps on unfamiliar slopes then packing up again and driving off."

For five years now Alan has been doing this. What began as a year off for skiing between school and university has now become a way of life.

"There is always the next race and then the next. In a way I am in a rut, because it is very difficult to get out of it. I have four Highers, I am 22 years old, and I have no qualifications for a profession. It worries me. But I have made a lot of friends around the world, I can speak different languages, and I have had a lot of experience.

"My advice to a young person keen on skiing would be: 'Make sure you know what you are letting yourself in for. Realise that once you are into it, it is difficult to give it up, and realise also that even if you do devote all the time and energy you have to it, there is the possibility that you might not have much to show for it at the end.'"

In spite of this wary counsel, however, Alan assured me that he has had no regrets.

"Even with the hassle, I am glad that I have done it."

'It's always nice to deal with kids'

School travel and school skiing trips are becoming big business requiring a special flair. Tim Albert talks to one of Britain's foremost tour operators

At best they are seen as the benevolent providers of a magical experience for young people; at worst as the cynical manipulators of parental ambitions and the desire of teachers to skive off for cheap holidays.

They are, of course, the travel operators specializing in school travel and skiing trips, and not surprisingly their own self image is rather different. They see themselves working in a market which is stable and comparatively easy in some ways to deal with, but which also has its own problems as well as (in some opinions at least) some particular rewards.

"Whatever you're doing it's always nice to deal with kids", says Peter Hopkins. "Adults tend to be so blasé about things."

Peter is a founder and joint managing director of Schools Abroad Ltd, who says that his own school trip to Paris was a formative influence. Born the son of a Welsh miner, he nearly played in goal for Spurs but went into the school travel business instead.

Today, while he is still in his 30s, his suite of plush offices in Burgess Hill, his S-registered Jaguar and small string of racehorses reinforce his admission that, "it provides a good living."

He started Schools Abroad in 1972, with a staff of six, a turnover of £60,000 and some 16,000 clients. Now this turnover is approaching £4m, with staff of about 60 and some 65,000 clients. Most of these—about 33,000—take skiing trips, while another 16,000 children, mainly of primary school age, go on tours to France; another 14,000 go elsewhere—Holland, Spain or even Jamaica; and a further 2,000 go on trips within the British Isles—to London or the Cotswolds.

"The basic advantage of the school market", he says, "is that they come to us in a group. It makes the job of handling and processing that much easier. But you have to be far more responsible with children."

Another feature of the schools market is that it tends to vary less than its adult counterpart. When there is a trough, many parents decide that, though they can't afford a family holiday, they will make sacrifices to send the children.

Yet the vulnerability of children means that a higher than normal proportion of service staff is required. Schools abroad have 12 sales representatives (or travel advisers as Peter prefers to call them) and another 50 resort representatives during the season, all of whom are instructed to make regular reports to the main office.

Hoteliers are happy enough with the market. "Where they have had no experience of children they have to learn to adapt. They must accept a certain amount of boisterousness, and a higher noise level.

"But these disadvantages are offset by the fact that children tend to stay in the hotel, and are happy to spend their money on things like soft drinks."

But the key to a successful school trip is invariably the quality of the staff—and this, everybody agrees—can vary. Peter says he is planning to reduce the ratio of free places to school party leaders from 10:1 to 8:1. "They are generally responsible", he says, "though occasionally there are problems of inadequate supervision.

"We try to take a tough line with them either through our reps or through the local education authority. The National Ski Federation of Great Britain has produced guidelines for party supervision, and, if behaviour of a particular party gets bad enough, we will take action on the spot.

"Usually the threat of withdrawing services is sufficient. And if we feel at the end of the day that a leader has not behaved in a responsible manner, we will take this up with the school or the local education authority."

Sometimes, however, things go badly wrong. Peter's biggest disaster was the well-publicized fire a few years ago in an Italian ski resort, where two children and a teacher were killed.

"It was a horrifying experience. With the benefit of hindsight we could now say that the travel industry as a whole could have done much more about fire risk. Now we try to concentrate on prevention in the first place and on simple methods of evacuation in the second. We take much more care in selecting hotels, issue a booklet to all parties travelling with us, and give our representatives a special training session on fire risk and fire drills.

Health problems and skiing accidents tend to be less of a problem. Peter says that although there is a regular trickle of broken legs, he has only had one serious injury—a fractured spine. "You have to try to ensure that people are well supervised, well instructed and have the correct basic equipment", he says.

Food, however, can be difficult. "We recently had a classic example of this. A parent wrote in and complained that the food was too Italian, while a teacher from the same party complained that it was too English... If most people like most meals we think we have done well."

He has four pieces of advice for schools planning trips:

(1) The brochure produced by the tour operator is his shop window. If it is badly put together, sloppy in its presentation or muddled in its content then it is a fair bet that the tour itself may be characterized by the same deficiencies. Book from a brochure which is clear, well illustrated and which is detailed.

(2) Do not even consider travelling with a company that is not a member of the Association of British Travel Agents. Any tour operator belonging to the association is subject to the stringent accounts rules and has to supply a substantial bond. Should you book with a company that eventually runs into trouble then ABTA will take responsibility for looking after your arrangements. Do not be impressed by membership of any organization other than ABTA—it is the only one which gives the very necessary financial guarantee.

(3) Choose an operator specializing in school travel, but be aware of the problems of booking with an operator who has an eggs-in-one basket interest in a specialist field. The recent problems in Greece and Cyprus emphasize the potential dangers for any tour operator specializing in one country.

(4) There will certainly be colleagues in other schools in the area who have taken their schools to the Continent. Consult them and find out all you can about the operator with whom they have travelled in the past.

"People", he says, "are beginning to ask for much more in terms of facilities. They are becoming more sophisticated. The business is becoming more streamlined and professional. And because local authorities and schools are going in term time we are able to negotiate contracts for the whole season. Otherwise prices would have risen much higher than they have done."

Figures and jumps

By Michael Coleman

The Technique of Skating. By Otto Hügin and Jack Gerschwiler. Translated by A. D. Simons.
Cassell £4.00. 0 304 29541 8.

Two noted Swiss skating instructors have made available an English translation of the Gerschwiler method, a work which may well become a classic on both the figure and free skating sections of this expanding sport.

Jack Gerschwiler has long been accepted as the authority on school (compulsory) figures but recent successes by skaters trained at the Denver rinks—or, rather, finishing schools—of Carlo Fassi (among them John Curry and Dorothy Hamill) have led to the impression that the Swiss school is out of date.

The astonishing free skating exhibited by a Hügin pupil, Denise Biellmann, aged 15, at last year's European championships in Helsinki has proved this view to be erroneous. All the triple jumps are within her compass—her technical range is, in fact, probably wider than Curry's was—and she accomplished a combination of double axel, thoren and triple salchow never previously attempted.

With skilful photography, using his daughter Bettina as model, Hügin in this book breaks down each figure and each jump into its component parts. Aided by a lucid text, the skater can run through again and again a movement taught on the ice but which needs repeated practice in the mind. Vital hip positions, the role played by knees, arms, head and free leg and the line of attack in jumping are painstakingly explained. This will be an invaluable book for PE teachers now that skating has been accepted as a school sport and penetrating questions can be expected from pupils after a lesson from a rink professional.

BARNSLEY SIXTH FORM COLLEGE

PRINCIPAL

(GROUP 12)

The Barnsley local education authority is establishing a sixth form college from September, 1979. The college will offer sixth form education to students from 11 comprehensive 11-16 schools serving the Barnsley and Royston townships of the metropolitan borough. It is anticipated that in 1980, when the college will have students in both sixth form years, there will be 450 approximately on roll.

The authority is anxious to appoint a Principal from September, 1978, to assist in the development and promotional work which will be necessary in the period before the opening of the sixth form college and applications are invited from suitably qualified candidates.

The successful applicant will have had experience at a senior level whether in a sixth form college or a tertiary college or in sixth form work in a secondary school.

The numbers of young people taking up sixth form places under the existing arrangements in the area are very low by comparison with the regional average and extremely low by comparison with the national figures and the authority's primary objective in establishing the new college is to improve upon the present position. Thus the authority is anxious to appoint a Principal who is committed to this objective and has the ability to make progress towards achieving it. The purpose-adapted premises have an estimated capacity of 600 students.

Although the curriculum of the college has not been determined finally, the authority is keen that it should play an important community role in the area in which it is sited and the Principal will be expected to have sympathy for and an understanding of this aspect of education.

Application forms and further particulars obtainable from and returnable to The Education Officer, 50 Huddersfield Road, Barnsley, and should be returned not later than 14 days after the appearance of this advertisement.

When the bear is not real...

Sara and Stephen Corrin talk about their popular story collections

Young children tend to build up intense associations with every experience. Through the pleasure associated with story-sharing some children come to school well on the way to becoming avid readers. Others start school without the benefit of such an experience and their bare and often impoverished environment provides little to enrich either language or imagination.

One might wonder how, if children's already rich fantasy life is nourished with even richer fantasy material, they are ever going to grow into reality. Susan Isaacs, in her celebrated altercation with Piaget, emphasizes that it is children's cumulative experience which brings them gradually towards reality and to more complex levels of thought. "There is", she says, "a progressive penetration of feelings and fantasy by experience." Piaget himself refers to the primacy of assimilation over accommodation in the child's fantasy world as a necessary stage before he can proceed to reality. It follows that stories for young children, the essential fabric of which is fantasy, should not be looked upon as a respite from lessons but as an integral part of their lives.

Tales for the fives and under need to start briskly, rise to a sharp climax and lead to a reassuring finish. Repetitive, cumulative and rhythmic elements are indispensable features. Because of the child's limited concentration span, the tales will tend to be shorter and the plots simple, though without loss of drama or adventure. The listener will then enjoy a complete emotional experience in one session. The ability to make believe appears very early in life and from three or thereabouts the child is ready for imaginative sallies beyond his immediate environment.

The simple themes of these stories portray, in common with adult literature, man's struggle to reconcile his need for security in the things he knows and loves with the magnetic pull of the strange and exciting world beyond. A child's first experience of stories will probably be through an adult's reading or telling. How exciting when he discovers he can read them for himself, preferably in a book he can call his own!

Gerald Rose's illustration for "Big Claus and Little Claus" in the collection "A Time to Laugh: Thirty Stories for Young Children."

We would expect both teachers and parents, who are rightly concerned with what children should read, to question some or even all of the choices in our anthologies. Personal taste must loom large in any collection and, as any teacher will agree, unless one enjoys the story oneself, one might fail to bring it to life for the young listener.

To the possible objection that our collections, by their very specific age titles, might smack of over-rigid classification, we point out, in "A Word to the Story-teller", that these stories will not, of course, be without interest to other age groups as well. Each age range has differing emotional and intellectual requirements, some stories being more suited than others to meet these requirements. Each age range—and each child within that range—will bring to the story a different level of experience and draw from it according to need; so that in a class of 40 seven-year-olds one is catering for 40 individuals at 40 different levels. And yet a whole class will sit entranced, linked by some magic spell.

We have never sat down and consciously worked out a set of criteria to be satisfied at all costs. But intuitively we seem to look for powerful and stirring tales in which the resolution of the emotional conflict is appropriate to the age span, where the telling is direct and where, through the use of evocative language, they come to life in the child's imagination. This ensures a variety of themes, situations and of local colourings: from the dark forests of Siberia bristling with wolves and witches, the wastes of the Arctic north where the Snow Queen reigns in her Palace of Ice, to the swampy jungles of the south where Elephant's Child visits Crocodile and is rescued only by the elongation of his trunk.

Shirley Hughes has illustrated many Corrin anthologies. This example is from "The Three Dogs" in "Stories for Seven-Year-Olds."

Humour, suspense, adventure, mystery, wonder are essential elements, and, above all, the stories must be memorable, leaving an indelible mark. Ultimately we look for balance in the anthology as a whole—myth and folk-tale mingling happily with stories set in the present—so that all facets of the human predicament are represented.

Selection is never a straightforward process of continuous work on a particular collection over months or even years, but rather one of pouncing upon any gem and earmarking it for inclusion in an anthology—which may (or may not) be published years hence. The resulting miscellany may thus consist of 15 stories culled from many hundreds after the rejection of many other hundreds.

All this leads to the question why we decided in the first place on the age-group formula. Any teacher or parent reading aloud to children will have had the experience of finding one story in a particular collection a tremendous success and all the others totally unsuitable. As teachers we found that for each story we had to browse through collection after collection before we hit on one which we enjoyed ourselves and were eager to share with our story-hungry listeners. So-called "nursery tales", for example, often contain only two or three appropriate stories cheek by jowl with a dozen dismayingly ill-chosen items. So one sympathizes with the harassed teacher having to choose the right story for her 35 pupils all coming from widely differing homes with disparate levels of experience. Our own anthologies are an attempt to meet some of these difficulties; that they have found their way into other tongues and crossed the Atlantic may be some evidence of the universality of their themes.

For the very young child the distinction between reality and fantasy is blurred. Walter de la Mare's young son, screaming with terror one night, told his father there was a big bear under his bed. No amount of reassurance that bears were not to be found in those parts (nor a thorough search under the bed by father and son) could assuage the boy's fears, so tellingly expressed in the words, "The trouble is, Daddy, it's not a real bear."

Nor is the child yet ready for the more exciting sorties into the strange, wondrous and often frightening realms of fantasy that the sixes and sevens revel in. By this age they realize they are in a world of make-believe. One six-year-old remarked, "You very rarely get a true story nowadays", and a seven-year-old, "I used to believe in fairies but I don't any more, but I wish I still did." Yet another six-year-old commented that "magic is something which makes wishes come true. Just about anything can happen, even if it's absolutely impossible. You could go to Buckingham Palace in a jiffy."

Walter de la Mare reminds us that children should be allowed to meet evil and fear and feel pity. And what better way, asks C. S. Lewis, than through the deeds of heroes brave enough to challenge and overcome their intimidating adversaries? And how better to confront the denizens of our own psyche—those forbidden feelings which astonished Francis Galton by the number of books they filled when he recorded them—than to identify, as it were, at a safe distance, with those ready-made symbolic figures?

The egocentric child, Piaget maintains, is incapable of taking account of motive in moral judgment. But this is beyond doubt not the case in his reactions to stories. He is outraged by cheating and ingratitude and is beginning to develop his own crude concepts of justice. "The animals were kind to the woodcutter, yet they weren't even grown-ups and couldn't speak our language", exclaimed a six-year-old, reacting to the incident of the trapped animals in The Wicked Lord Chamberlain. Good and evil must be clearly defined and evil vanquished. "Witches should be got dead before they do any more damage!", expostulated a seven-year-old.

The task of selection understandably becomes progressively more difficult as children's interests become individualized—markedly so from around the age of eight onward. Now the need is for stories of moral struggle and intrepid quests, of heroes whose exploits have so inspired man that he has come to accept them as true; myths and legends are of such stuff. The nines and tens are more interested in the human dilemma; they are developing insights into the complexity of human nature, they apprehend the seamier side of life and can accept the unhappy ending.

Short stories are especially encouraging to reluctant readers, who relish the satisfaction of getting through a complete story. In trying out our own stories we were unaware of cultural or ethnic differences in our listeners: one felt something of a collective response.

There can be little doubt that sharing stories with children is a key instrument in educating them to an understanding of themselves in their relationship to others and in refining their developing sensibilities.

Sara and Stephen Corrin's collections are published by Faber and Faber and Puffin. Forthcoming from Faber are "More Stories for Seven-Year-Olds" and "Stories for Nine-Year-Olds" (1979).

COMING THIS YEAR
READING 360
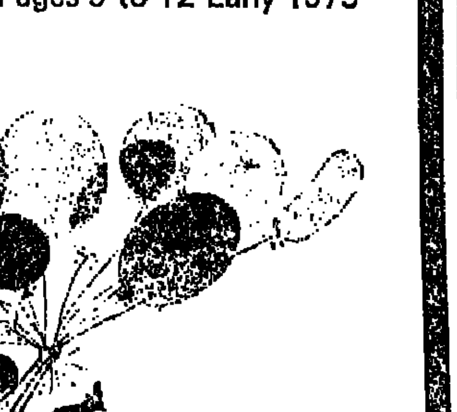
The Ginn Reading Programme will be published in two parts during the next twelve months
Levels 1–8 for ages 5 to 8 Autumn 1978
Levels 9–13 for ages 9 to 12 Early 1979



Reading 360, Ginn's major contribution to the teaching of reading in the late seventies and the eighties, offers

- A balanced and structured skill development programme
Carefully controlled development of decoding skills, vocabulary, comprehension, creativity, language use, literary understanding and appreciation, and study and reference skills throughout its thirteen levels.
- Proven classroom success
The British edition has been developed on the basis of extensive classroom trials throughout Britain, following the programme's widespread success in the USA, Canada and Australia.
- Comprehensive teacher guidance
Level-by-level teacher's notes offer a wealth of resources for creative classroom activities, together with diagnostic and evaluation material.
- Coverage of the full 5 to 12 age range
Reading 360 does not stop at age eight plus. It progressively develops the higher order reading skills through to age twelve.
- Flexibility and compatibility with existing school resources
The format of Reading 360 permits maximum flexibility in the classroom. Extensive suggestions and bibliographies in the teacher's notes allow for full integration of existing school resources with Reading 360 materials.

Ralph Lavender on reading

Language in Action Wave Three: 11 titles.
Macmillan 30-35p each.
Scamps: seven titles. By Esta de Fossard. Photography by Haworth Bartram.
E. J. Arnold 90p each.
We Can Read: four titles. By Boswell Taylor.
Hodder and Stoughton 45p each.
First Contact: four titles. By Michael Hardcastle.
Collins £1.50 per set of four.
The Puppies' Tale. By Fred Archer. The Canefield Fire. By Therese Mills.
Macmillan Caribbean Yellow Bird Readers 50p each.

Language in Action comes in waves, and this is part of the third. Of the 11 books, all but two are core books at level three (there are four levels in the whole programme); and of the other two, one is a core book and the other a special feature at level two. The books are written by such proven children's writers as Janet McNeill, Roy Brown and Geraldine Kaye; and this fact is reflected in the quality of some of the texts.

Down-in-the-Mouth Clown is the story of lone Cathy, sad because her pet cat is lost, who draws a sad face on her school puppet. But Paddy the traveller's boy brings the cat back. Happy Cathy's puppet now has a glad face. "Paddy Rouse has gone away with his family. Cathy says he will come back some day. Mousette did!" Or, in Roy and the Pointon Express, the village has narrow cobbled streets and "the houses were packed tight like oysters in a box". There is wit and humour in some of the stories, such as More Than Acorns, which concerns, among other things, the delights of conker-bonking.

The rhythmic quality of language is exploited in other stories, such as The Hermit's Purple Shirts, as is alliteration and assonance. In The Rook that Took a Cookery-book, which happens to be a very moral tale because the mean cook is cured of keeping his dustbins locked, these devices of word-play make reading aloud obligatory: how this makes sense of that most crucial of all reading behaviours, reading silently to oneself, is not clear.

One of the least successful titles is Sam Wishes, in which these devices are carried to the point of almost extinguishing context-support. This is one of the dangers inherent in a reading programme of this kind, in which attention is drawn, especially at the earlier levels, to features of word structure like "The vowel phoneme (speech sound) frequently represented by y, ie, and igh." The danger is that meaning gets pushed into the background along with strategies such as prediction.

Teachers will need the supplement to the resource books if they want ideas in addition to their own on the purposes and uses of these books. The fluent child reader is more likely just to read the stories with pleasure, and ignore the features of configuration and morphemic structure he is supposed to notice.

Scamps is another collection of alliterative animals: curious kitten, a dog with a difference, and an unfriendly foal and so on. The texts are simple if not very distinguished but the colour photographs are beautifully affectionate. Only the two books about Monty the mouse misfire, the mouse-sized furniture and the mouse-sized front door are too artificial. Monty mouse is an anthropomorphic as well as an alliterative animal.

The four books in the We Can Read series by Boswell Taylor are a two-and-two for even younger children. Lonely Cloud is a rather impressive little study of pictures in the clouds, with fine illustrations by Gordon Stowell; and The Jipijapa Hat is quite a jape. But the other two books are much too precious: no boy interested to read about racing cars wants cars with pop-eyes for headlamps. Realistic illustrations would have been far more satisfactory. All four stories are also available on a cassette.

Michael Hardcastle's four First Contact books (for a generously estimated reading level of nine years) are about a bed race along the promenade during a family seaside holiday; a canoe race; a school break-in when two boys catch a thief stealing the school's audio-vidual aids; and an incident of rescue from a derelict warehouse.

These stories are racy, fast-moving and action-packed. They try to be completely realistic, as the black and white drawings confirm; but they fail, because these are not credible kids. For those who wish to seek out the typecasting of sex roles, they are a necessity. These books come in a foursome; and there are workbooks to go with them.

Finally, come two Yellow Bird Readers, aimed at Caribbean children from seven to 13. The Puppies' Tale is written as dramatic speech, and the time shifts and place changes are not too easy to follow—nor is the writing idiomatic. The Canefield Fire, a much denser text, contains two stories, and the second one is about a boy who escapes from the reformatory where they never wear shoes. Both stories reflect Caribbean life. but the writing is rather flat, without even the saving alibi of alliteration.

Wait and see?

Mary Hoffman

Hummingbird Books (4 titles): By Sheila McCullagh.
Hart-Davis Educational. 85p each non-net.
Fun to Read Books (4 titles): By Marie Hynds.
Blackie £1.95 each.
Young Shorty Books (12 titles): By James Webster.
Ginn £5.00 the set.

When educational publishers find a natural storyteller, they work her hard; and it is usually a woman. Hart-Davis have now published eight Hummingbirds by Sheila McCullagh and have four more to come this year. Ms McCullagh's pen seems infinitely refillable; as a few stories are drawn off the top, a new supply wells up to replace them. These extension readers to Hart-Davis's own scheme, One, Two Three and Away, are elegantly enough produced to attract a wider audience. On each batch of four titles a stylized "nature notes" kind of theme frames a picture-link to the story. Vanessa Luff is responsible for these covers which are much more attractive than most of the illustrations. It's not clear why one of the titles, Jacca and the Talking Dog, has the much larger type-size of the earlier batch and none of the books use script "a's" and "g's".

Two of the stories pick up characters from the first four, but the best, Peter and the Little Fox, is quite new. Peter has to turn a spellbound glove puppet back into a real fox at the risk of losing its company for ever. Just as in traditional tales where a bewitched creature is restored to its original form by getting someone to chop off its head, the story rewards courage and unpossessive love.

Blackie haven't found quite as prolific an author in Marie Hynds but she has written four new titles in their Fun To Read series. These are expensive laminated hardb but they do have full colour trations. There is a pleasing r mix in the pictures but this it low key in the text which give flavour of Indianness to Raja or of West Indianness to Ann, members of the Giraffe (which features in two of stories and promises to le more.

The fantasy elements of th time and space just happen, out preparation, and might be confusing for the "nearly reader" that the series cater The one totally naturalistic A Bird To Dream About, is i Fauntleroy tradition of a gr grown-up being humanized th friendship with a child, and in an old-fashioned shower of sents and changed fortunes.

James Webster, who Ginn to write 12 new books for Rescue remedial reading offers a very consistent story and treatment. The books are fully produced, with the first titles in extra large type and "a"s and "g"s are used thr out.

They're called Young S books, although the puppy in is called Boy and the boy is John. Perhaps this is a "wait see" device. The stories are ventional and gently entertai It's nice to see John's Mum ing trousers occasionally—th a pinny is still de rigeur breakfast—and John's best fr is unemphatically black. Jo cousin, Karen, is forc liberated from the restrictions frilly dress when Boy tears it she can then run around in Jo old jeans.

Conversation is printed in which seems an unnecessary co plication, since orthography sign it anyway with inverted comma But this device is common to other Rescue stories, so teache who already use those books find it justifiable.

Now read on . . .

Carry on Reading. Red Series 2 and 3 By S. A. Stagg and J. A. Wynn.
Schofield and Sims 85p

These books are designed to give children who have just worked their way through a reading scheme the desire to "carry on reading" by awakening their interest and enjoyment. This is a laudable aim, but, alas, not one that is likely to be fostered by these dull volumes full of standard fare, poorly illustrated and punctuated by "checkpoints" featuring banal questions and confusing definition. They offer an inferior alternative to Wide Range Readers or to the Gold and Silver books of Through the Rainbow and seem bent on inculcating a Reader's Digest attitude to literature.

It is particularly sad to see the first few pages of The Iron Man extracted when the book itself is short, cheap, easily accessible and greatly enjoyed by so many children. Is it really likely to promote enjoyment and interest, to ask a child, who has just read the exciting and beautifully written account of the reassembly of The Iron Man, "What colour was the seaweed on which the head lay?"?

Quentin Blake's amiable mon monster is already a famili character to readers of Longman Tadpole Books. There are now at 65p each. Ellen Blance and An Cook draw on conversation with children for the texts of the ones which have titles "Monster Buys a Pet" "Monster Gets a Job".

Acting to read

David Self

Take Part Series. By Sheila Lane and Marion Kemp.
The Wombles. The Family from One End Street. Space Hostages. The Land of Oz. Mystery at Black Pony Inn.
Ward Lock Educational 60p each.

Almost any system of teaching reading involves the learner in "reading aloud" and (sadly) all too often this can seem an uninteresting chore to both pupil and distracted teacher.

"Play reading", however, is reading aloud with a purpose, and (provided it is properly managed) it has a number of specific advantages. It is obviously more dramatic and entertaining than merely reciting a prose reader, paragraph by paragraph, to even the most attentive teacher. All involved gain confidence and experience by taking part in a group activity and (so long as there is careful casting) weaker readers can cope with the less demanding roles and also learn from the abler readers as they tackle the more complex speeches. If the script is sufficiently well structured, a small group can work on their own with a minimum of supervision.

The Take Part series has been designed especially to cater for this kind of activity. Each book has been adapted or "dramatized" so that there are six or seven roles with reading levels varying from six plus to nine plus. Children at the lower levels are introduced to difficult words and phrases by abler readers who meet them earlier in the text, so the books not only develop reading skills but allow for mixed-ability collaboration in which each child is still working at his or her own level. Discreet notes inside the back covers indicate the reading age level of each character and a teacher's guide is also available.

It should be pointed out that, while these are carefully structured reading aids and while they may encourage the better reader to turn to the original books, they are fairly drastic adaptations. It was inevitable that some of the flavour should be lost; we should be grateful that so much of the original style and mood is preserved. Potential users might note that there is considerable variation in the sophistication of the titles in this present batch, ranging from somewhat naive adventures in the land of Oz to Nicholas Fisk's story Space Hostages.

Reservations apart, there will be few teachers who do not find this series a stimulating way of providing reading practice for small groups within their classes.

Be flexible!

Directions 1: Reading Skills. B John Cooper.
Oliver and Boyd 95p. 05 002416

Directions is based upon the pre mise that "after learning to rea pupils have to read to learn". Th aim, therefore, is to practice "higher order comprehension skill and flexible reading strategies".

This premise may, however, be a valid one. No child can lea to read without simultaneous reading to learn. The question be asked is this: what is he lea ing from his reading? And answer, in part, should be: flexi reading strategies.

Without doubt, the skills of u books for the retrieval of info tion have to be taught and learn Children need to understand, example, the principles of alp betical ordering and how to as shown in this book. But do learn alphabetical ordering skimming in the exercises alphabetical ordering and skim or in the service of using book Find out what they need?

New primary mathematics publications increasingly tend to make smoother the integration of both familiar and newer content and of traditional and modern teaching progression.

For closely allied infant and junior schools, sharing confidence in their pupils' responsiveness, the continuity of the Kite and Maths Adventure series merits consideration. The thorough presentation of basic ideas is matched by challenges to imagination and reasoning power, while exercises are designed to promote competence with understanding.

Kite 5 uses visual models rather than abstractions to familiarize groups of tens and ones, and to develop addition and subtraction. Kite 6 similarly approaches multiplication and division, and Kite 7 involves the four operations, including Number Line applications. Minimum reading is entailed, while the development permits infants to settle to independent work with aroused interest.

Maths Adventure Pupil Book 5, following purely primary work in books 1-4, seeks a smooth transition to secondary work. It concentrates on numbers, shape and algebra, maintaining, with declining significance, the earlier involvement of fictional children.

The author's belief that "success is not born in the chaos of haphazard mathematical investigation" is expressed in the book's structure, convincingly supported by supplementary exercises in the Activity Book and confirmed by the uncomplicated Teacher's Book advice. Well-adjusted balances exist between topic and topic and, within topics, between exploration, insight and consolidation. Room is given to operations with bases 3 and 5 and for fractions and decimals. Index notation is considered and the concepts of averages, percentages and proportion introduced. Graphical work includes looking at interception and gradient while metric measures are extensively explored. The treatment of Shape is thoroughly modern. Interpreted, too, with effective, often amusing sketches, the work presented with vectors, translation, rotation and reflection may well prove within most pupils' grasp.

Many teachers welcome shar others' experiences. With NORMAC booklets they are assu that successful teaching ideas h been collated and are offered as gestions rather than defini schemes of work. Thus the Reception teacher is given conf mation interwoven with fresh spiration. The Introduction Measurement concerning leng capacity, weight and time, de helpfully with the use and ra of apparatus and equipment. develops ideas, such as the cons vation of matter, and builds essential mathematics vocabulary.

Bricks, Boxes and Containers, lower juniors, uses their envir ment and familiar 3D material. Pr gression leads from sorting matching and classifying to order pattern, measurement, construct and simple projects. Many pra cal starting points are cited. Num ber Fun concentrates on teachi children undeveloped in Engli Reading and vocabulary work ar integrated with mathematical e periences at all times. Numb Patterns are for the 10 to 11 Square and triangle numbers ar explored, and number squares, nu ber patterns and magic squar looked at in a fresh way in wha is termed a "second level" mathe matical activity.

The Hesse Workbooks are well known for the thoroughness of their preparatory and consolidating mechanical exercises. Book 6 maintains that reputation. Packed with hundreds of examples, ample drill is offered in numbers, place value and the four basic operations using decimals.

Primary Mathematics: A Handbook of Suggestions for Teachers. By K. Auckland, J. Ibbotson, G. R. Jackson and G. White Globe Education £3.25. 333 19920 0.

This handbook was produced for the Doncaster Borough Council for use in their primary schools, and is the result of researches by a working party drawn from local teachers.

It provides a feast, almost a surfeit, of suggestions which inexperienced teachers of mathematics will find very helpful. Doubtless some of them will be welcomed even by established teachers as ways of bolstering their well-tried methods of getting a point across to their pupils. It has obviously been compiled with devoted care and in the light of the researchers' experiences in the classroom; one can assume the ideas work.

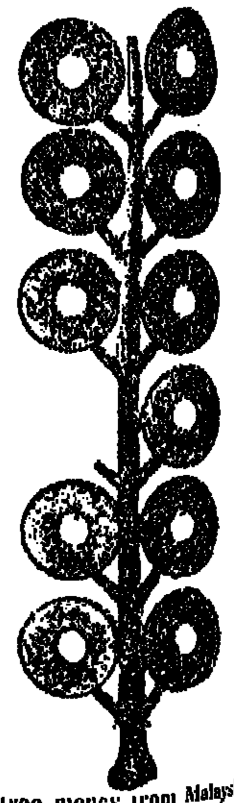
But the pages are crammed with a multiplicity of methods in some topics, and with involved diagrams which are daunting, to say the least. There is a typical diagram which looks like a wiring chart for a working robot, under the heading, "The Operation of Division", which bears the caption, "Untidy it may be, but perhaps it helps to illustrate the point: 4 sets, 6 in a set". There must be a simpler method; perhaps with counters.

The analytical aspects of some of the topics, such as the addition of ordered pairs, area of a circle and probability, are questionably part of a primary syllabus; while there is surprisingly no mention at all of the function of the decimal point or operations with decimals, which do not feature even in the sections on metric measure.

There is no index or list of contents, which would be helpful, but there is a comprehensive glossary at the back, and a good bibliography.

These deficiencies are a small price to pay for the many excellent sections, especially on geometry, shape and tessellations. There is a useful section on line and rotational symmetry and many suggestions for practical work, something which too often gets forgotten in a classroom.

Given a discerning teacher with time to browse and choose, and with a knowledge of the capabilities of his charges, this book will achieve its aim of being "of value to teachers in their efforts to help their pupils to know, to understand and to enjoy mathematics"



Tin tree money from Malaysia is one of a range of primitive currencies illustrated in "Picture Reference Money" (Hodder and Stoughton £1.75). The story of money, including coinage, banking and the stock exchange, is told entirely in pictures.

American dreams?

David Sturgess on the theory of teaching primary maths

Individually Guided Mathematics. By T. A. Romberg.
Addison Wesley £4.80. 201 19411 2.

This book is one of a series produced as part of a teacher education project at the University of Wisconsin. Individually Guided is not another name for what has become known as "individualized instruction" but is much closer to what has been called in this country "child centred" education. It is not therefore a new approach in education as claimed in the foreword, but it does take a very clear and thorough look at how it is possible to make mathematics child centred, and it is far removed from some of the woolly and romantic writing that has appeared under that label.

The book deals with the mathematics of the primary school (it is necessary to translate K-6 into the equivalent stages in our schools) and the six chapters cover: the processes of learning mathematics; the use of instructional objectives; content; organization; and the teacher's role. All these topics are dealt with in an academic way, with constant references to research and other writing in the field. Although the language is strange, much of all this can be found in books published in this country, although it is not often treated with such care for detail. As with many books of American origin there is very little mention of what we would call environmental mathematics.

Any teacher trainer or primary school teacher willing to make the effort to translate the material into more familiar language would find much of value in this book, but the fact that nearly all the references are unfamiliar, and even unobtainable, makes it of marginal value overall. An Anglicized version could make an important contribution to the present debate on primary school mathematics.

Nature stories

Harold Appleton

Look How: Natural History/Integrated Studies. By Ian Carstairs and Alan Lynskey.
Longman (prices below).

This series, aimed at the nine to 12 age group, is based on a series of stories and workcards together with a teacher's book. Option A, a reference set of a single copy of each title, costs £4.25 plus 75p postage and packing. Option B—any numbers of any selection of titles, cost 30p each for 25—49 copies, 25p each for 50—99 copies and 20p for a hundred or more, plus, in each case, extra for postage and packing.

Each A4 size booklet contains an eight-page story illustrated by photographs, each based on personal expeditions of the authors, some in the United States and others in Britain. A section entitled "Activities" includes writing, art and craftwork and items to find out or discuss. Further suggestions are found in the teacher's unit, together with references to relevant stories and poetry.

In the centre of each booklet is a pull-out worksheet—a four-page spread of sketches and notes, enlarging the natural history, and containing a series of questions. Some sketches, for example, those of the badger, could be much clearer.

In some booklets there are items that might have been better omitted. Woodlands, a story about badger watching, starts with a totally irrelevant paragraph which seems to encourage tree-climbing. Bat Cave recounts a "potholing" adventure in search of bats which turn out to be swallows. The sketchy preparation and light-hearted manner of the expedition might easily encourage children to put on their skateboard helmets and, taking a torch, venture into serious danger. Admittedly the teacher's unit, which will not be read by the pupils, states "...activity like this is not to be recommended without expert help".

Things Ain't Always What They Seem is an interesting account of a trip in California in search of the elephant seal, with a diversion to examine a vast number of Monarch butterflies. Was it necessary to add the final paragraph? A man who had just murdered his family, and who later shot himself, might indeed have been in those woods, but need it have been recorded here? Seabird City tells of some rather inexpert cliff climbing to see various seabirds, including gannets and puffins. Meeting the Bear is self-explanatory and includes a flight to San Francisco.

Death's Head is of course the hawk moth, and recalls an unsuccessful attempt to hatch an undamaged adult. Dancing World describes a day spent watching herons from a hide in a tree. I am sure the results were worth the discomfort. Ghostly Shapes is a mystery story set in Scotland, with a barn owl as the villain. Long Walk takes place in "the North of England" and is an excuse to talk about wild flowers. The adder also finds a champion here. Chains are the food variety. The story deals with a sick owl which fails to survive, and touches on the problems caused by upsetting any part of a food chain.

These stories, which often only hint at underlying issues, are intended as a starting point for class discussion and research. Before buying class sets, teachers might well obtain and study the reference set to decide how much of the material they are able to use, and which parts offer the greatest scope for their particular pupils.

World about us

World Resources: Timber. By W. H. Brown.
Priory Press. £2.95. 85078 240 6.
The World of an Island. By Philip Coxon.
Faber. £3.25. 571 10999 3.
Let's Look at Ulster. By Rex Cathcart.
Ulster Television, Havelock House, Ormeau Road, Belfast BT7 1EB.

Here are three very useful books for the primary school library which would be helpful in project work. They are most suited to upper juniors and could be profitably used in middle schools.

Timber is part of the expanding series on world commodities entitled World Resources. It is excellently written by a man who has spent all his life in the timber trade. A full examination of timber is undertaken from the forests to the saw mills and then to its utilization in building, furniture, paper-making, packaging, sports equipment, musical instruments and elsewhere. Careful consideration is given to forest conservation and to the future role of timber especially in terms of competition from other materials. More than 100 black and white illustrations have been well-chosen from a diversity of international sources. Particularly heartening is the sensible use of forest distribution maps in relation to text and photographs. Tables summarize well-known uses of timber and statistics, and there is a useful glossary and source list.

World of an Island is very different. The story of North Uist in the Outer Hebrides is told with delight and affection by a former warden for the RSPB. The book is divided into three main sections: the making of the island, wildlife, and the people. One of the outstanding attractions of this book are the 25 original drawings by Michèle Coxon. There are also 23 black and white photographs with three maps. The text is difficult in parts but the book would fit in well to an island theme in the primary school.

Let's Look at Ulster is part of an environmental studies television series which has been transmitted since 1970 but recently remade with the advice of teachers. The series is supported by an education kit consisting of a school textbook, a teachers' handbook and a pupils' broadsheet. It is the former and the latter which are discussed here.

Both follow the 10 television programmes of the series dealing with the market town (including Ballymena and Cookstown), beside the sea (Portrush), making cloth, fishing, roads and streets, down on the farm, houses, woods, carrying goods, and what people come to see. The broadsheet can be used for individual work or display and includes photographs, maps and sketches with some text. The textbook consists of 44 pages with many photographs and maps both in colour and black and white.

From little acorns . . .

Francesca Greenoak

The World of a Tree. By Allen Paterson. Illustrated by Elsie Wrigley.
Transworld Publishers 50p. 552 57121 9.
The Tree. By Iela Mari.
Dent £1.95. 460 06847 4.

Both these books for young children are examples of a kind of book already quite well established. The large-format Wonder Why Book has short, large-type paragraphs and captions to accompany the pictures on every page. As a first information book it does a fair job, and at a reasonable price for full colour. It starts off strongly showing how to grow an oak seedling and how growth continues until the plant becomes a mature tree. The tree is both realistically and attractively illustrated, and there is a nice use of a reflected image to convey the extent of the root system. Wind pollination, which is tackled later, would have been more comprehensible if the little red female flowers which eventually produce the acorns had been included in the picture as well as the male catkins (an unconscious bit of sexism I am sure).

The book encourages children to make their own "tree diary" about the life in and around one particular tree, and to look at other references to help in this work. Sooner or later any child interested in natural history is going to come up against scientific names and I should have liked to have seen a few included here. (What this author calls "oak apples" are more often now called "oak marbles" and while "Green Oak Beauty" is a lovely name I think the moth in question, is Procris statices which is more usually known as "Common Forester".

A book which rightly encourages children to look outwards both to observational experience and to written references ought also to prepare them as far as possible for the exercise. Maybe the next edition could also include a short reading list of good and accessible books.

The Tree is a book without words, a concept now fairly familiar in Britain, though few books of this kind originate here. This one takes the well-run theme of the seasons, moving from one winter to the next in 15 brightly coloured illustrations. The book is imported from Italy and has a fairly inhibiting disadvantage, in that while the central image of the oak tree is familiar, the creatures of the book, a family of Lesser Grey Shrikes and a "Glis-glis" (or Edible Dormouse) are not animals which are normally found in Britain—although Glis-glis may now be found in a small area near Tring in Hertfordshire, thanks to Lord Rothschild's passion for importing foreign animals to his estate.

Puff puff Puffin along

Brian Alderson on the publication of the thousandth Puffin

"How many Puffins make a thousand?" is too severe a riddle to find its way into The Puffin Crack-a-Joke Book. You need lists, and history books, and cobwebs round your brain-cells to answer it—but by my computation the total comes to 1,423. That is a nice enough number in its way—in fact it looks like a positively prime number—and I cannot see any reason why Puffins should not choose it to celebrate their one thousandth book. After all, with a publishing list like theirs any excuse for a celebration will do.

Part of this confusion about numbers stems from the various species into which the genus Puffin has divided itself. The Crack-a-Joke Book is, in fact, number 1,000 of the "Puffin Story Books" and it comes out after 36 years of the series' existence—but even so it does not belong to the first or only group of Puffins to appear on the market.

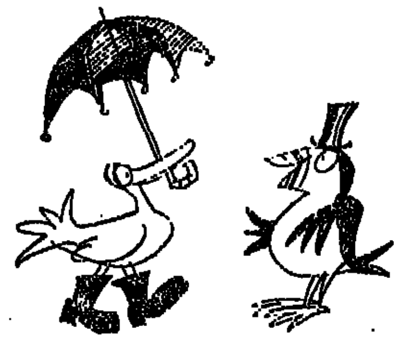
The hatching and christening of Puffins must be credited to the joint energies of Allen Lane, and the publishing impresario Noel Carrington. Mr Carrington recalls that he had had the idea for a series of books that would "arouse and satisfy the child's awakening interest in its surroundings" during the late thirties. He put the plan to Allen Lane over lunch one day in 1939 (lunch being the most creative period of most publishers' lives) and—typically—Allen Lane made up his mind after "three or four minutes and as many questions".

Within an amazingly short space of time, given the confused conditions at the start of the war, the editorial and design policies had been worked out, and in December, 1940, the first books were published. They were War on Land and War at Sea by James Holland, and War in the Air and On the Farm by James Gardner, and they bore the series legend Puffin Picture Books.

Allen Lane's genius for list-building would obviously not stop at producing children's information books, however brilliant or revolutionary the design (although more praise than ever needs to be paid, in these days of instant non-fiction, to the skill, taste and understanding of Noel Carrington as editor of this masterly series). As the first Puffin Picture Books were rolling through the press Allen Lane was discussing with Eleanor Graham the formation of a companion group of fiction titles and, at the end of 1941, Puffin Story Books began to appear under her editorship. ("I do not want to have anything to do with badly printed, out-of-copyright classics" she had told Allen Lane, when talking about editorial policy, "rather the best of the new work being done for children". "That's exactly what I want", he had replied.) Number 1 was Barbara Euphan Todd's Worzel Gummidge, which remains in print to accompany number 1000, in 1978. The four other titles were Cornish Adventure by Derek McCulloch, The Cuckoo Clock by Mrs Molesworth, Garram the Hunter by Herbert Best and Smoky by Will James.

Compared with the attractive format and colour lithography of the Puffin Picture Books, these early Story Book titles have an air of shabby gentility which suggests some uncertainty as to how to attack the market. For Noel Carrington had everything going for him: he was producing new titles, with a popular swing to them, in a notable new style (for Britain anyway), whereas Eleanor Graham was working more closely to plans that had been devised for the main Penguin series. Her first books had "Penguin-style" covers (with the orange panels replaced by red) and they suffered sadly from the greyness of 1941 paper. Moreover, it was not so easy to promote cheap reprints of this kind to the public. The growing breed of specialist children's librarians, who would endorse Miss Graham's editorial policy, did not want paperbacks.

It cannot have been easy trying to implement a policy for the paperback reprinting of children's books at a time when such a thing was exceptional and when even your allies in the pursuit of quality were not to be relied on. For not only does there seem to have been little backing from librarians in this commercial venture, but the hardback publishers seem—as the designation implies—to have been from time to time pachydermatous and impenetrable. "I should have liked", writes Eleanor Graham wistfully, "to start with a Ransome and a Dr Dolittle, but both were refused—consistently refused—throughout my editorship". (As indeed were also "the famous series of beautifully produced children's book of good quality" produced by Oxford University Press). Swallows and Amazons did not arrive in Puffins until 1962, The Story of Dr Dolittle until 1967, and the virgin dignity of the OUP books was only surrendered—almost too late—in 1967.



Despite difficulties, however, Eleanor Graham brought to her editorial duties the kind of intelligent zest that has been a hallmark of the whole Penguin enterprise from its inception. Before long the formal covers were replaced by pictorial ones (I think Carcajou, in 1943, was the first of these). Titles for a variety of tastes were introduced: W. E. Gladstone's The Puffin Puzzle Book, J. B. S. Haldane's My Friend Mr Leakey, Stevenson's A Child's Garden of Verses—a volume that carried specially commissioned illustrations by Eve Garnett, and had the first of Eleanor Graham's light, but authoritative, prefaces on how the book came to be written. There were even some subsidiary series introduced—outside the Story Book numbering—like Baby Puffins, and Puffins Cut-out Books, and Porpoise Books—which were to be the forerunners of the vastly more extensive recent series of Picture Puffins.

When Eleanor Graham retired in 1961 she had seen about 120 books through the press in as handsome a display of editorial consistency and integrity as one could wish for.

Original compilations like A Puffin Book of Verse, The Puffin Song Book or the beautiful Quartet of Poets set standards for paperback anthologies which have not been bettered. And in the case of books like Norman Lindsay's The Magic Pudding or Norman Hunter's The Incredible Adventures of Professor Branestawm Puffin maintained titles in print that might otherwise have disappeared. It is probably true to say that Norman Hunter, who is of all living writers for children the one with the longest record of life-in-print, owes his present huge popularity to the existence of Professor Branestawm among the Puffins.

The sixties saw the acceleration of many changes in the publication of books both for children and adults, which totally altered the nature of paperback publishing. Among these changes might be numbered: the regular annual increase in new books, which greatly added to the pool of material available for selection; the regular annual increase in the cost of hardback books, which was a major factor in starting the paperback boom; and the much greater readiness of all customers (including schools and libraries) to see paperbacks as permanently acceptable editions rather than as second-rate alternatives. The quality and prestige of Penguin Books was, in good measure, responsible for the new status of paperback publishing and, in so far as competition in the field now sharply increased, Penguin must have had some rueful thoughts about their own distinguished reputation.

This was particularly so where children's books were concerned. During her years as editor, Eleanor Graham had hardly needed to worry about competition from rival paperback houses—the few attempts, like Scottie Books, to establish children's paperbacks, were lacking in both flair and stamina. But the leadership of Puffins was bound sooner or later to be assailed and Allen Lane's instinct for the right move was once again in evidence when he appointed Kaye Webb to succeed Eleanor Graham.

Kaye was the person in a thousand—or indeed the person in 1,423—to carry Puffins into the testing years of the sixties and seventies. She recognised the need to maintain the standards that were a hallmark of Puffin Books ("...the best of new work ...") but she combined with her judgment here a highly individual sense of the way children may be led to respond to books. Suddenly the editing of Puffins became not simply a contract between writer and publisher but a contract between publisher and a mass of children who, unbeknown to themselves, were going to be Puffineers.

A glance at a graph of the output of Puffin titles shows pretty clearly the moment of Kaye's arrival. Up to 1961 Puffin Story Books had exceeded 10 new titles a year only in 1958 (13), 1959 (12), and 1960 (12), but after 1961 figures climb rapidly. In 1962 19 new titles were published, in 1963 and 1964 23 and in 1968 54. Moreover, although this rise in numbers does not signify a perceptible lowering of standards, it does presage the widening hospitality of the list to the diverse children's books of the period.

Something of the verve which Kaye brought to her edition can be seen in her early Puffins: in autumn 1962, for instance, the little cluster of How to be Topp, A Bear Called Paddington, and Thurber's Thirteen Clocks; or her championing of those masterpieces Moonfleet (her son's favourite book) and The Midnight Folk or her final cajoling of Swallows and Amazons out of Jonathan Cape; and, perhaps most significant of all, in 1963, her commissioning of two stories for original publication: Clive King's highly successful Stig of the Dump and William Mayne's A Parcel of Trees ("because we couldn't get his other books").

The question of "getting the books" was henceforth to become one of rising importance. In 1967 the Brockhampton Press began their paperback series of Knight Books heavily dependent, it is true, on their "house authors" but signalling the first properly planned incursion into Puffin territory. Paperback editions of the adventures of the Famous Five or the Secret Seven may not have constituted a threat to the Puffin list, since Enid Blyton was never a Penguin author, but there was nothing to stop Knight Books relieving Puffins of books by other authors like Margaret Baker and Henry Treece, Elizabeth Goudge and Rutgers van der Loeff, once their Puffin contracts expired.

This advantage which the publishers of an author's original edition have over the buyers of reprint rights was to become something of a feature in the battle for the children's paperback market that developed during the seventies. Following the example of Brockhampton Press, firms like Dent and Faber and Oxford University Press brought out paperback series of their own children's books, while, in 1971, the emergence of Collins's Armada Lions and Pan's Piccolo series, with priority access to books from publishers like Macmillan and Heinemann, stepped up the pressure even more. It narrowed the choice of books that might in the past have been seen as "natural" Puffins, and—a bitter blow—it led to the disappearance from the Puffin list of established authors like Michael Bond and Alan Garner.

The response of Penguin Books to competition in all areas of paperback publishing lay in the merger that was arranged in 1970 with the house of Longman—which gave Puffins themselves direct access to the rich reserves of children's books

My New Sister. By Bo Jarner.
A & C Black £1.25. 7136 1708 4.

This excellent book gives a clear photographic account of the birth of a new baby, with a simple, but not over-simplified, text written from the point of view of a toddler, fascinated by her new sister. It shows the advanced stages of pregnancy, the birth itself and the everyday routine of a family with a new born baby.

The toddler is involved throughout: there is a delightful picture of her listening to her unborn sister, then, while the baby is breast feeding, she drinks milk from her old bottle and while the father changes a nappy she powders the baby's bottom. The vocabulary of the text is limited, though the syntax is occasionally unnecessarily complicated (for example "Sarah being born was very tiring for both of them"). Nevertheless many children will have no difficulty in reading it for themselves and even those who cannot will gain much from the photographs. However, it does seem a pity that in such an admirably frank book the word "tummy" should be preferred to "womb". Was it so in the original Danish, I wonder?

Scandinaviana

Sweden is like this. By Stig Weimar.
Kaye and Ward £2.25. 7182 1166 9.

Perhaps our geographical understanding of other countries would be much improved if we were lways to read books written and ed in those countries but translated into English. This book was first published in Denmark but it produces a real feeling for Scandinavia as a whole.

It is short, with about 29 pages, but it has a simple text and many lovely coloured pictures which evoke the spirit of the place. It is pleasant to note the well-developed use of maps alongside the journey through Sweden. The Swedish tour extends from the farming area of Skåne and Karlskrona, the fishing port in the south, to Gotland, Lakes Vänern and Vättern, Stockholm in the central area, Kiruna and Lapland in the north. Additionally, the pine forests, sawmills, Göteborg and the Göta Canal are mentioned. In each instance a double-page illustrates the scene.

The book ends with a useful glossary giving correct pronunciations for Swedish place names. It is a pity this excludes Riksdagen, Öland, Dalarna Kebnekajse, Siljan, Trollhätten, Göta and Kullen.

Sharks and butter

The First Look Series.
Aircraft. By Robin Kerrod.
Sharks. By Sarah Riedman.
Butter and Margarine. By Lorna Hinds.
Tools. By Robin Kerrod.
Franklin Watts £1.75 each.

The "First Look" books have been prepared for older infants and the lower age range in junior departments. The text is simply written but informative and is used to supplement the many line drawings and photographs which make up the bulk of each book.

Of the four books considered here Sharks and Aircraft will have greater appeal to children than either Tools or Butter and Margarine. I do not think my judgment has been unduly influenced by the titles, although I must say that a photograph of a lemon shark enlivens a page rather more than a drawing of an adjustable spanner with a movable jaw.

This, of course, is just one of the problems which face a publisher who determines to market a series of project books for school use. Adequately to meet the somewhat quixotic demands of children there has to be a wide range of titles—and it becomes increasingly difficult to add titles to an already extensive list.

Frogs and others

Wild Life Studies: Series 2.
Adders. Earthworms. Frogs. Lizards. Hedgehogs. By Oliver Aston.
Basil Blackwell 95p each.

Each of these 32-page books has one or more excellent colour photograph on each page and the text is restricted to short paragraphs, mainly describing and supplementing the photographs, yet telling a story in a connected form.

Hedgehogs, Earthworms and Frogs each includes brief comments on keeping the creatures for short periods as pets or for study; I would prefer to see this discouraged, particularly in the case of frogs since, thanks to pollution and indiscriminate collection of spawn, it is now becoming an endangered species. Lizards and Adders do not fall into the same "pet" category, and the relative dangers of the adder are sensibly described.

Wild Life Studies is a graded series, and series 1 contains simple descriptions, suitable for six to nine-year-olds, of a number of habitats. The series under review contains more detail and is aimed at seven to 12-year-olds, and a further series 3 claims closer studies introducing more biological principles and terms for the 10 to 14-year-olds.

Discovering: Church Architecture. London Canals. Kings and Queens. Country Crafts. Toys and Toy Museums. Trams and Tramways.
Shire Publications 50p-60p each.

The authors of the little Discovering books are enthusiastic, knowledgeable amateurs whose anecdotal approach displays considerable scholarship.

D. E. Wickham's Kings and Queens is a fascinating guide to the many places which have a connexion with our sovereigns. (Did you know for instance that Queen Elizabeth II was born at her maternal grandparents' home at 17 Bruton Street, London, and that she spent much of her childhood (1923-1926) at 145 Piccadilly?)

Discovering Trams and Tramways is not merely about electric trams but also about the horse-drawn variety and even the steam-powered predecessors.

In Country Crafts the author describes the craftsman's method of working, the tools and equipment used.

While there are other similar series which are larger in size, better bound and printed and sometimes cheaper, these short studies serve a useful purpose in their attractive presentation of some historical highways and byways.

published by Longman Young Books (later renamed Kestrel Books), including fiction by writers like Leon Garfield, Philippa Pearce and Barbara Willard who were "in Puffin" anyway. Kaye Webb, however, had also been building her own redoubt against the aggression of new publishers of children's paperbacks: the brilliantly conceived Puffin Club.

There is nothing like competition, either, for stimulating editorial acumen, and it is probably true to say that, during the seventies Puffins have shown a consistent flair for finding the unexpected success—the book which gives character as well as cash returns. First publication in England of Ursula Le Guin's The Wizard of Earthsea (1971) is a case in point, but one might also single out Kaye's rediscovery of Kathleen Briggs's Hobberdy Dick (1972), or the fine paperback editions of those classics Bevis and Pinocchio (both in 1974), or those very different but very rewarding compendia of 1975 The Puffin Book of Magic Verse and The Puffin Book of Improbable Records. More recently, by way of compensation for the defection of some publisher-linked authors, an agreement has been reached for Puffins to draw upon the resources of Faber and Oxford University Press children's lists, with the result that much of the work of writers like Lucy Boston and Rosemary Sutcliff will eventually be Puffinized.

Indubitably there have also been failures and difficulties. The first four titles of the ambitious Folk Tales of the World series; the three Puffin Annuals have been brave compilations but exceedingly hard to sell; and, perusing the chronological charts, one finds, for instance, that Puffin Story Books numbers 324 and 333 (At the Back of the North Wind and Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales, both circa 1967) have not yet been published though both are on the 1979 programme.

Such aberrations in a list like that of Puffins, however, serve more to highlight than to diminish the performance. For, through all the vicissitudes of the last 40 years, the standards have been maintained. The ideals embodied in a four-minute conversation between Noel Carrington and Allen Lane in a pre-war restaurant, and in the shadowy volumes discussed with Eleanor Graham, while the bombs fell on Hounslow, have been carried through without condescension and with very little compromise. As an anonymous sloganeer in the Post might put it: Puffins have proudly persevered in purveying posh, practical, perfectly pomskizillious products for the pleasure and plaudits of the puerile populace. There's nuffin like them, and may we all be spared to enjoy the next 1423 titles

The Ecology of Imagination in Childhood. By Edith Cobb.
Routledge and Kegan Paul. £5.75. 7100 8793 4.
The Essential Piaget. By Howard E. Gruber and J. Jacques Vonèche.
Routledge and Kegan Paul. £13.95. 7100 8778 0.
Children: Behavior and Development, third edition. By Boyd R. McCandless and Robert J. Trotter.
Holt, Rinehart and Winston. £9.50. 03 089750 5.

There are some relatively new or unfamiliar ideas which are presented in such a way that they are difficult to evaluate when one first meets them. A passage of time is needed during which other minds re-present them in simpler language and spell out in more detail their import. Edith Cobb's thesis on The Ecology of Imagination in Childhood is in this category.

It consists of a number of related claims. She suggests that each human being needs to form a unique world image and to give it expression in some altered form.

This process, Edith Cobb suggests, is an integral part of achieving a singular identity and is as important to psychophysical and psychosocial health as is the need for love. She terms the process "ecological" because it involves an interaction between the individual and the natural world, and "biocultural" because its roots, she maintains, are biological, and yet each man's world image is modulated by the cultural milieu to which he belongs. This creative process is evidenced in childhood in play and art, and it is only in the most creative individuals that the special qualities of childhood persist.

To present Edith Cobb's thesis in these terms is necessarily to simplify it. The difficulty is to know to what extent one is also oversimplifying, that is to what extent her ideas are essentially simple ones somewhat pretentiously presented, or more complex ones reflecting a highly imaginative and insightful synthesis.

This difficulty in knowing precisely what Mrs Cobb is claiming and hence in being able to evaluate her claims is the result of two disturbing features of her book. First, the language she uses is often ambiguous. The following example must suffice, though one could have chosen among many. She writes: "Language imposes pattern and sequence on the flux of mental experience, and the child senses the need of having a 'history', as well as the need to participate in that history, which is the story of the world around him. Again, in this sense, language is behaviour, a form of patterned energy that enables the child to metabolize his perceptions of the external world."

The reader is left to guess whether the first sentence means that language determines experience or merely reflects it. These two very different positions represent a major controversy among psychologists concerned with the relationship between language and thought, a controversy that has by no means been resolved. Similarly, it is not clear whether the second sentence means nothing more than the simple truism that language is a means by which we code and store experience, or whether the physical and biological metaphors concerning "energy" and "metabolizing" are intended to describe another more complex process.

The second difficulty arises from the way in which Edith Cobb supports her thesis by drawing on a great number of disparate sources. The quotations, culled from various sciences, the arts, autobiographies and philosophy, in places exceed her own words. This style makes for fragmentation. To take again one example from many, she claims that the schizophrenic is an individual who is too plastic in his response to the external world, but some pages later she writes that the schizophrenic is imprisoned in a closed-in world of self. It is possible, indeed probable, that both claims are valid and that the schizophrenic's encapsulation in an idiosyncratic world has become a defence against the intrusions of a world to which he is overresponsive, but Mrs Cobb does not resolve her apparently contradictory claims in this way.

It would be unfair to dismiss this book. A more appropriate response would be to withhold judgment until Edith Cobb's thesis has been interpreted in less ambiguous terms and has been supported by more valid and extended references to empirical work, in particular to cross-cultural studies of differences in children's art and play. In the meantime the book could prove most valuable in provoking teachers to reflect on the place of play and art in the curriculum.

By contrast, commenting on Piaget's work and interpreting it in more simplified form has become a major academic industry. Indeed there are now so many books on Piaget that one is almost driven to ignore yet one more. To do this to The Essential Piaget: An Interpretative Reference and Guide, by Gruber and Vonèche would be a mistake. It is a comprehensive and balanced anthology of Piaget's work including selections from both the experimental and theoretical aspects of his epistemology as well as from his writings on philosophy, on biology and its relation to knowledge and on education. In each section the selections are preceded by clear and helpful introductions and accompanied by explanatory notes which really do illuminate the text.

Before they can grapple with Piaget's work, undergraduates in both psychology and education need a broad perspective of the kinds of questions with which developmental psychology is concerned and an acquaintance with the various ways in which experimental evidence relating to such questions has been gathered. A welcome third edition of the classic by McCandless and Trotter, Children: Behaviour and Development provides just such a perspective. To keep pace with recently burgeoning theory and experiment in developmental psychology this new edition contains a great deal of material not in the previous 1967 edition. It also differs from the previous editions in reading level. An effort has been made here to lower the level so that it is suitable for students taking an introductory course. It is well written and students should find its interesting as well as understandable.

Build up

See Inside an Airport. By Jonathan Rutland.
See Inside a Television Studio. By Georg Beal.
See Inside an Egyptian Town. By R. J. Unstead.
Hutchinson £1.50.

R. J. Unstead who edited this series will probably go down in the history of English education as the writer who pioneered "visual information" books. These three titles follow the now established pattern: pages of colour spreads, photographs and diagrams, a simple but accurate text, a glossary, an index and a bibliography. The presentation aims first to fire a child's interest before leading him on to more detailed study.

Of the three titles, I found See Inside an Egyptian Town the least successful. This might be because reconstructions, cut-aways and artist's impressions make up so much of the text that the reader is left wondering whether he is looking at fact or fantasy. See Inside a Television Studio and See Inside an Airport obviously do not suffer in this way. They are busy books, full of recognizable people doing work that we can appreciate and understand, using equipment which we know about.

Perhaps this is where Egyptian Town (and some of the other historical titles in this series) fail. Mr Unstead has taken us so far down the road to reality, that when his books become romantic the mind revolts against it. I do not doubt that King Akhenaten was a poet who composed hymns to the sun and who sat in pensive mood as his beautiful daughter washed his feet. But I am much happier when the captions are about scanners, video tape machines, refuelling techniques and flight plans.

Bricks and Mortar, Sand and Water. By John Claxton and Sally Doganis.
Hamish Hamilton £2.50. 241 89371 2.

The all-in-a-day books (of which this is the most recent) are unusual in that they are composed almost entirely of black and white photographs. The photographs tell an everyday story (like building a house) through the eyes of two children. In Bricks and Mortar and Sand and Water, Andrew and Eve visit a building site. They learn how to mix mortar, build a wall, use a spirit level. They visit a brick works, handle clay, look inside a kiln. Finally, they return to the building site to experiment with plastering and painting.

This little book is most instructive—but I wonder whether it goes far enough. An inquisitive child will probably wonder how the drains are laid and how the house in linked to electricity and water supplies. That apart, this book and the others in the series go some way to bringing realism to school texts.

The stories behind history

Wide Range History

L.E. Snellgrove

Reading Consultant: Phyllis Flowerdew

Explorers, inventors, social reformers, religious leaders, scientists, and many others who left their particular mark on history are brought vividly to life in the pages of Wide Range History. Some of the main events from 40 centuries of history are described in story form and are introduced chronologically in a format that will capture the imagination of young readers.

This four-book graded series caters for reading across the curriculum in a systematic way, employing an established history writer as author and a renowned reading expert as consultant to ensure proper grading, appeal and vocabulary control.

The stories can be enjoyed for their own sake, but the series does also offer a developmental course in historical events, people and concepts.

Each book has large clear print and colour illustrations on every other opening.

Cashing in on curiosity

Philip Hytch on science

Active Science Two. by Albert James.
Schofield and Sims 95p. Teacher's notes 35p.
Collins Young Scientist's Book of Waves. Collins Young Scientist's Book of Strength. Both by Michal Kentzer.
Collins £2.50 each.

Books which contribute to the science area of the primary and middle school curriculum divide themselves into two broad types. There are those which present to the non-scientific reader a range of concepts and phenomena which are then "explained" in, it is hoped, simple terms. These may be classed as reference books. In contrast, there are those which seek to engage pupils in scientific modes of thought through active involvement in inquiry which follows scientific procedures. I would suggest that the latter is likely to contribute more to children's development in this area, though both types of book clearly have a place.

Waves and Strength are the latest additions to the Collins Young Scientist series (Heat and Cold were reviewed on February 11 last year and are essentially reference) books or at least books to be browsed through in the science corner. They appear to be strongly made, have glossy covers, a profusion of illustrative material and a good index.

Because of the very wide range of topics covered, the textual explanations are frequently couched in language too concise for comfortable assimilation, unless the reader is already on terms with the subject matter. The treatment is often superficial, as instanced by the section on cameras in Waves—where we are taken from the pinhole to the most modern camera in two crowded pages, not neglecting developing, enlarging and printing en route. The illustrations, while colourful and often attractive, do not on examination always contribute as much as they should to explanation. There are many competitors in this part of the market, notably from the United States, and I found these two examples (as with the first two in the series) rather disappointing.

In an ideal world, science in junior and middle schools would be generated by the "instinctive curiosity" of children in this age range—and there are undoubtedly some classrooms, with very gifted teachers, where this is the case, for some of the time at least. But some important issues may not be raised by children's questions, and in any case the majority of teachers welcome the support which is given by structured course materials prepared, tried and tested by someone more expert in the field.

The Active Science series, of which the first two of four books are now available, provides a most acceptable example of the second type of text referred to above, and seems to me to offer teachers a most acceptable compromise. In the helpful teacher's notes which accompany each book, Albert James recommends an open-ended approach in which the actual route taken through the books will depend on factors which the teacher is in the best position to know. This example from the series has much to recommend it. It is clearly written by someone with experience of children's language, as well as knowledge of the way to stimulate and develop scientific imagination and inquiry.

The two topics considered in this volume are Air and Water, and the range of questions, observations and experiments is impressive. Much of the material is located within the first-hand experience of most children, and the suggested experiments, while demanding appropriate preparation and forethought on the part of the teacher (greatly assisted by the teacher's notes), are not beyond the resources of most schools. The layout is attractive, there is an abundance of helpful illustrations, and—most essential if the books are to achieve maximum flexibility in use—an index.

As one would expect from the deputy director of the Schools Council Science 5-13 Project the author resists the temptation to "explain" in the sense of providing children with ready-made generalizations. The emphasis is on the active involvement of pupils, and the opportunity to record, report, discuss and argue. This example augurs well for the series as a whole and it is to be welcomed in providing children with a good deal of fun as well as giving a sound basis for scientific study in junior and middle schools.

In the lead

Mental Arithmetic. By S. F. Jex.
Books 1, 2, 3 and 4 45p each.
Answers book 55p.

This attractively produced series of booklets, each containing 30 tests, will be very welcome to busy teachers who are keen to test the basic knowledge and skills of their pupils. Each book is colourful, well illustrated with diagrams, clearly laid out in large print—and very good value.

Each page contains 20 graded questions on "number, shape and measure". The idea is that the slower pupils do questions 1 to 10, while the faster go on to do 11 to 20 in the same time. But there is no suggestion what this is expected to be, which means that each test can be timed to suit the particular group taking it.

The questions are simple, comprehensive and straightforward. A few puzzles or simple brain-teasers could have tested knowledge and been a pleasant diversion. As well as covering the four rules, fractions and decimals very thoroughly, the tests contain many questions on Roman numerals—original—and nets of solids.

The grading sets a high standard from book 1 onwards, and any pupil who scores highly in the tests will have been well grounded indeed.

The World of Machines.
Machines and Farms.
Machines and Communication. By John Milsome.
Burke Books £1.60 each.

The books in this 14-volume series are well produced with colourful illustrations and large clear print which makes them attractive to young children. Unfortunately, the content of these particular two titles does not match the standard of production. The clarity of style required in books such as these must not be achieved at the expense of factual correctness and material must not be oversimplified to an extent that may lead to the development of wrong concepts.

Machines and Farms opens with clear and simple accounts of the work of the tractor and the plough. Thereafter too much is attempted, and inevitably confusion follows. Where the work of several machines is dealt with on a single page it is frequently not clear which machine is actually illustrated. The text itself contains too many ambiguous and misleading statements such as "Large seeds and plants need special planting machines such as a post-hole digger." To say that "wet hay is called silage" is the type of oversimplification that is unacceptable.

Machines and Communication gives a fairly comprehensive cover of the various types of machines used in communication. While much of the material is interesting and stimulating, this book, too, is marred by statements which, at best, do little to explain how the machine works and at worse may give rise to misconceptions. To state that "the volume is controlled by means of a knob on the record player" is hardly an explanation. The description of how a telephone works and the use of terms such as "radio sound waves" provide further examples of misleading simplifications.

These books could both be useful as starting points for project work but they contain too many textual errors and ambiguities to be recommended to schools operating on tight budgets.

Weather-eye

Snow and Ice, by Philip Sauvain (Franklin Watts £1.95) is a simple little book about snow and ice, at high latitudes or on mountains, and their effects on people, agriculture and animals. Less than half of the space is devoted to text. An alert 10-year-old with an interest in geography might be better off with something more substantial, whereas a less alert uninterested older child would probably find little here to arouse his interest and attention. Two pounds is a lot to pay for a minimal amount of information.

Gerald Haigh on short stories

The Last Run and other stories. By Arthur Catherall.

Heinemann £3.90 434 92588 8.

Once Upon Three Times. By Robert Nye.
Ernest Benn £3.95 510 00016 9.

We all realize, I suppose, that the short story—on the surface such a simple thing—is notoriously difficult to bring off successfully. If handled carelessly, it may turn out to be nothing more than the skeleton of a possible novel, with a hurried plot and sketchily developed characters.

The title story in Arthur Catherall's collection shows exactly these faults. It is about a runaway train, maliciously turned loose on a strike-bound railway system by an unspecified "lunatic". A veteran driver and a retired steam engine are sent out to stop it. The basic notion may not be entirely implausible, but the rate and order of events fail to convince. The writer, in fact, substitutes haste and thinness for pace and economy.

This is a pity, because other stories in the book are much better. The writer has travelled widely, and is at his best in settings more exotic than Crewe railway station. For me, the best of the bunch is "The Aluminium Ring" which has as its climax a gripping description of the plight of two men afloat on a dead and sinking whale.

The two stories by Liam O'Flaherty, published as separate slim volumes, are excellent examples of their kind—atmospheric tales simply and yet poetically told. All Things Come of Age is an unsentimental story about a young rabbit coming to terms with the brutality of nature. The Test of Courage tells of two boys who drift accidentally out to sea in a fishing boat, and how they face up to the ordeal.

Each story is about how youth learns about the realities of life: the young rabbit is introduced to the concept of death and to its status as a part of nature; the two boys are made to realize that there is mortal danger not far outside the protective circle of the adults who care for them. These are not essentially children's stories, but they have plenty to say to the young reader, and it may be that the best way to introduce them is through sensitive reading by the teacher. The stories are illustrated with delicate pencil drawings by Terence O'Connell, in a style which is perhaps at its best in All Things Come of Age.

Up the Airy Mountain contains 10 stories of magic by Ruth Ainsworth. The linking theme is of ordinary children coming into contact with the fairy world outside—and sometimes inside—the back door. Miss Ainsworth's fairies are satisfactorily menacing beneath the surface sheen of jollity around the toadstools. Puck, pulling stools from under old ladies and curdling the milk, would feel at home among them, and may well be there already for all I know. My favourite among the stories is "The White Rabbit", about a family pet stolen and enchanted by the Little People. Not far behind was "The House Brownie", about a shy creature who tidies up the house during the night—"Smaller than me, but bigger than Topsy. Something brown. Something green. Oh, he wasn't like anything I've ever seen."

I was particularly taken with the way that the adults in these stories, as well as the children, accept the existence and power of the fairy folk. As in all the best fairy stories, it is the reader, sitting out there in his one dimensional suburban world, who becomes the outsider, looking in on to a richer and altogether more exciting sort of life.

The book is well produced and very nicely illustrated by Eileen Browne. The three colour plates are particularly good and their presence is a welcome and nostalgic reminder of a time when so many children's books had them.

Once Upon Three Times is also beautifully produced, and magnificently illustrated with tremendous vigour and skill by Shelley Freeman—although someone ought to tell her what a Rolls-Royce radiator looks like.

Robert Nye has taken three traditional tales—one Indian, one English and one French—and retold them with such charm that tradition and originality are combined in a delightful way. "Mr and Mrs Vinegar", in particular, is almost a send-up—albeit a respectful and affectionate one—of the original. I laughed out loud several times at this book, which is a pleasure to handle, to look at and to read.

These hard cover books have a presence and attraction which the small format paperback cannot attain, and they deserve a place in school libraries.

Viga tends the sunflower that was once her husband, Prince Sans Soleil. Their story is one of six original fairy stories in "The Moon Ribbon and Other Tales" (Dent £2.50) by Jane Yolen, illustrated with full-page black and white drawings by David Palladini. They have the qualities of traditional fairy tales, sometimes sinister, sometimes joyful.

Gentle dragons

Grimblegraw and the Wuthering Witch. By Barbara Sleigh, pictures by Glenys Ambrus.
Hodder and Stoughton £1.95. 340 22166 6.

The Witch of Witchery Wood. By Joan Cass.
Hodder and Stoughton £2.20. 340 16871 4.

Albert and the Dragonettes. By Rosemary Weir. illustrated by Gerald Rose.
Abelard Schuman 60p.

The Alligator and his Uncle Tooth—A novel of the Sea. By Geoffrey Hayes.
Andersen Press/Hutchinson £2.25. 905478 25 8.

What a milk-livered lot we are these days! What has happened to the gore and those bone-chilling phrases that kept one awake for hours after bed-time? Blue Beard's Castle floor "covered with clotted blood on which lay the bodies of several dead women"; Rumpelstiltskin who "in a passion seized his left foot with both hands and tore himself in two"; or the tears of the "three grey women" that "froze as they fell from the hollows where no eyes were, and rattled on the icy ground of the cave".

Our Witches, Alligators, Dragons and Giants are friendly or miserable or misunderstood. In Grumblegraw and the Wuthering Witch, the giant at least manages to tread on a few unfortunates as "his eyes whirl round like Catherine Wheels". But the danger of brimstone and fee-fi-fo-fum is quickly dispelled when he gets back his sight. He even turns up at the Princess's wedding. In fact the ambivalence between crushing bones and lamenting that "there's no-one my size" makes it hard to get a grip on an entertaining tale that owes much of its inspiration to Cyclops and Medusa, with more than a hint of Lot's wife.

The rest of these books plump firmly for the anti-Gothic approach. The Witch of Witchery Wood is a dotty old crone armed with a tatty spell-book, an ill-mannered cat and an aging broomstick with a will of its own. Her plans to waylay the princess go awry, while the princess herself is mistakenly metamorphosed into another black cat. But alienation and pins and needles are about the worst that befall anyone. The machinery for giggly thrills of horror works perfectly (cockroach sandwiches set the tone), so that we are entertained and the witch is forgiven.

Albert and the Dragonettes goes one stage further. The dragon faces real human problems: a one-parent family with two spoilt kids and a cave that's too small for the three of them. To make matters worse, there are unpleasant neighbours—a cowardly sea monster moves in next door. The conversation of the dragonette twins is like the everyday prattle of the kids next door. But a strong moral flavour provides a certain bite to the narrative tone of this everyday epic. The here-and-now style means it's not the best of possible worlds—but it's not the worst of fantastic worlds either: "Good dragons never eat meat. . . ."

Eating habits sum up the impression of the books. Dragons eat seaweed, witches eat cockroaches, friendly alligators live on pints of carrot soup. With The Alligator and his Uncle Tooth we are safely tucked up in a world of soft toys and cuddly felt animals without any teeth. Corduroy is the charming name of a diffident alligator, who dreams of adventure and the jolly rodgered sea. His buccaneering Uncle Tooth recounts exploits in the Sea of Spume, how he won a fortune, lost his heart to a mermaid and deceived a sea monster with a passion for tangerines.

The sounds of the words have a quizzical ring which comfortably ruffle the senses: "In the evenings Auntie Hick stayed in the sitting room, with pomegranate wallpaper, reading detective novels, drinking tea spiced with peppermint or knitting mufflers." And what the children lose in exact understanding, they will gain from the magic of this original tale. The Alligator is a charming introduction to adventure. And there'll be quiet sleeps and sweet dreams when it's over.

Modern Mother Goose

Mother Goose comes to Cable Street—and about time too. Rosemary Stones and Andrew Mann, and Dan Jones's pictures, have done a marvellous job of bringing the old lady back to life.

The doctor's surgery for Doctor Fell, the forbidden Port of London Authority territory for Tommy Tittlemouse caching fishes in other men's ditches, the school summer camp for Pease Pudding Hot—the funfair for Boys and Girls Come Out to Play—this little collection almost unerringly puts 20 old nursery rhymes into a modern urban context that is perfectly plausible in all details. (Published by Kestrel £2.25).

It would be a great pity if this version were to be written off as just something for an urban multiracial primary school. It's just the thing for all children. It's full of funny details and jokes (several of the pictures have scraps of conversation written into them). And as an added bonus, there's a whole second book of playground rhymes compressed into the endpapers.

The richness of this slim little book shows up the ordinary run of picture books for the meagre and inflated offerings they often are. Mother Goose comes to Cable Street stands looking at, and reading again and again. And if anything helps children get on with reading, and loving books, it is books that stand rereading.

Eve Rice can do it, for very young children, by simplicity, naturalism, and quiet humour. Mr Brimble's Hobby (World's Work £2.70) is a set of short stories about the Brimble family, and has all those qualities — though unlike some of her others, it is a bit too visibly based on an American suburban home, full of books and musical instruments.

It is particularly good to find a proper book, with a table of contents, introduction, and very short chapters, for beginning readers to read on their own. It is odd, given the meagre content of many picture books, and the inevitably high price of colour printing, that more publishers don't go for short stories.

World's Work has something of a corner in them, with Little Bear, Frog and Toad and so on. And children seem to love them—choosing which story to read seems to be one charm of the Rev Awdry's engine books, or Winnie the Pooh, when it comes to books for reading aloud.

Three Friends by Robert Kraus, with pictures by Jose Aruego and Ariane Dewey (Kestrel £2.95) is one that might have lent itself to the short story treatment. As it is, it is virtually a table of contents with some amusing and attractive pictures.

The three friends are a motley trio—Leo the tiger, Milton the panda, and Herman the octopus, and they meet and have a series of games and adventures. The pictures are full of charm, but it is a rather muddled production, and could do with a few more words.

There is less muddle when the same illustrators combine with Mirra Ginsberg in The Strongest One of All (Hamish Hamilton £2.75)—but less fun, too. This is the old folk tale about the quest to find the strongest—ice makes lamb slip, sun melts ice, cloud covers sun and so on until lamb eats grass. Aruego and Dewey's humour just manages to carry it off and the repetition and clear text make it good for beginning readers.

There and Back Again, by Harold Jones (Oxford £1.75), is another tantalizing offering that makes one wish it were a set of short stories. Bunby, a stuffed rabbit, has a classic stuffed animal adventure, getting into a boat and sailing down the stream.

It would be a lot of work for this original and meticulous illustrator to produce short stories. But it might help to stimulate a text to live up to the pictures.

Virginia Makins

Dickensian

At the Time of Charles Dickens. By Christine Favell.
Longman 75p. 582 18248 4.

This is Christine Favell's first contribution to the Focus on History series and she has provided a valuable course-book for primary teachers or those of transitional classes in the secondary school.

It explores Dickens's life ingeniously, and introduces some of his novels, using this material to provide a vivid picture of the Victorian world. From Cheapside to Van Dieman's Land and Boston Harbour, from daily life in the workhouse to Christmas at Buckingham Palace, an age is brought into focus.

It is richly, though selectively, illustrated by photographs, prints (from the works, Mayhew's London, Doré, Punch, among many others), advertisements, tracts and notices of the period. Particularly valuable, for this particular study as well as for the development of useful skills, is the way the pupils' attention is always drawn to the significant details in each picture; skimming is not encouraged.

One caveat only: the children are invited to undertake so many attractive supplementary tasks — to make a Dickens notebook, models, freizes, drawings, visits, an exhibition — that the teacher will need to exert considerable restraint not to overbalance the whole curriculum.

Sitting around, looking at books

Mary Hoffman on reading development

The Development of Reading Skills: a book of resources for Teachers. By Frances Ball.
Basil Blackwell £5.25. 631 17660 8. £3.50. 631 18290 X.

After a brief introduction, Frances Ball's book falls into two parts. The second lists over 2,000 words categorized according to certain features, such as initial and final consonants, blends, digraphs, silent letters and prefixes. These are the words teachers might want to use in the games and activities cited in the first part.

The games and activities relate quite specifically to the pre-reading and reading skills to be developed: they are represented diagrammatically in the introduction, and many of the areas of skill are also itemized in an informal inventory. The pre-reading activities consist of games to develop visual and auditory discrimination, hand-to-eye coordination and the recognition of letter shapes. It might be just as helpful if the term "pre-reading" were to be banished altogether. As Frank Smith has shown with great elegance, the young child responds to written language in his environment before he ever becomes a "reader" in the school sense; he can already make many of these discriminations, or he does not need to be taught how to make them.

The reading activities focus on letter and word-to-sound correspondences, with a marked leaning towards the use of the wheel. If a child can already read at the level required for some of the example sentences, what is the point of making them nonsense by giving him the wrong vowel digraph to find? The third group of activities—puzzles, codes and comprehension exercises—gives opportunity for writing.

Even if a teacher were to use none of this material, it should make for a sharper awareness of what is being taught and how it is being taught. And the author aptly remarks that children should sometimes be able to read unimproving books, "just sitting around looking at books". Perhaps this is the context in which the best teaching and learning may take place?

Geoff Tomlinson on poetry

Moon-Bells and other poems. By Ted Hughes.
The Knockabout Show. By Gerda Mayer.
Chatto and Windus £1.95 each.
Come Along. By Stanley Cook.
Huddersfield Polytechnic Department of English Studies 50p.

The Chatto Poets for the Young series is now well established and has been widely praised. Yet the practice of devoting a whole volume to poems by one established contemporary poet is still a comparatively untried one. In presenting children with challenging reading, one has to take care that the challenge is not so great as to deter the reader from attempting the adventure. It is one thing for the world-weary adult intellectual to respond to the social savagery of Ted Hughes's Crow poems, but for the world-weary teacher to feed such morsels to his charges is a different business altogether.

Consider, for example, the first two stanzas of Ted Hughes's Horrible Song:

The Crow is a wicked creature
 Crooked in every feature.
Beware, beware of the Crow!
When the bombs burst, he laughs, he shouts;
When the guns go off, he roundabouts;
When the limbs start to fly and the blood starts to flow
 Ho Ho Ho
 He sings the Song of the Crow.

The Crow is a sudden creature
 Thievish in every feature.
Beware, beware of the Crow!
When the sweating farmers sleep
He levers the jewels from the heads of their sheep.
Die in a ditch, your own will go,
 Ho Ho Ho
 While he sings the Song of the Crow.

There is no doubt that the language of such poems can be understood by an alert top junior, but in what sense can we expect a child to respond to such poems? Do we believe him capable of balancing the cruelty in the world against the aesthetic shaping spirit which can transform cruelty into poetry? Hughes's book may be suitable for some primary children, particularly those who are aspiring poets themselves, but it would be unwise to consider these volumes as suitable for unsupervised classroom use.

However, not all the poems in Ted Hughes's volume are so savage. At least a third of the poems are moon-poems, most of them somewhat more complex than those which found their way into the Earth Owl collection, and a further third consists of poems about creatures. But, savage or not, very few of these poems make serious concessions to the young reader.

The poems in The Knockabout Show, by Gerda Mayer, are no less modern in tone and execution, but they do seem more instinctively in tune with the child's world. Titles such as Ice-Cream Poem or At Night in The Launderette may not sound too promising as signals for profound reflections, but they do offer a reasonably tempting invitation to the average child who may be walking the streets of poetry unaccompanied. Gerda Mayer's poems have terseness, simplicity, and wit. Many of them are kindly little poems in their rhyme and rhythm but there is often a momentary clench to the jaw which persuades the adult reader that this woman is no fool. As an example of a poem which is accessible, economic, starts from a familiar childhood situation and ends where you like, consider the following:

IT

When you were IT your short legs strained
To reach your loud hallooing prey,
You knew that you would never catch
The world which laughed and ran away.

When you were sought by IT you crouched
Behind a bush with tearful breath,
Or stumbled, waiting to endure
Sharp and inevitable death.
A hare-like hound, a hang-dog hare,
Awkward in flight, slow to pursue,
Dear Self, how will you play the roles
Society assigns to you?

Along with these two hard-backed attractive review copies, came a thin, duplicated booklet, Come Along, with a little note from Stanley Cook explaining that since commercial publishers had shown no interest in his 47 poems, he had printed them himself.

Stanley Cook's earlier little volume, Form Photograph showed how humanity could still be seen lurking in the traditional secondary school by anyone with an eye for it. In terms of accessibility Come Along is the most approachable of the three volumes. Publishers counting their pound notes and paper clips, or judges deciding on the Poetry-for-Children Award might consider some of these poems too childish, but I do not think many primary school children would turn their noses up at them if a sympathetic adult were to consider reading them. It is high time we had more crows in the classroom, but until we do children will at least know what you are talking about if you read them "Barney and Fred"—and there are plenty more where that came from.

Like the guinea pigs Barney and Fred
Who nibble away
Wood shavings and hay

I should never feel Like making my house a meal
And gnawing the wood
To do my teeth good.

I never met anyone yet
Who eat the floor and carpet
Except, as I said,
Barney and Fred.

It is encouraging that one of our greatest living poets thinks it well worthwhile writing for children, and is idealistic enough to aim over their heads in the hope they will grow.

Poetry by a shrewd, cheerful and quietly skilful poet can still find a publisher. And a middle-aged man, who thought it worth his while writing for one small group of children, also has the zest to print the things himself when publishers were slow to see the value.

Animal heroes

Naomi Mitchisor

The Further Exploits of Mr Saucy Squirrel. By Woodrow Wyatt.
Allen and Unwin £3.25.
Gladwyn Goes to Town. By Paul Callan.
Hodder and Stoughton £2.80.
Oggy At Home. By Ann Lawrence.
Gollancz £2.95.

Here are three books about talking animals; which means, if you do not care for talking animals, leave them alone. They do, however, talk in very different voices, so if you are thinking of buying one you had better pick the voice you prefer.

This one, for instance, is Woodrow Wyatt pretending to be a squirrel. It is full of jokey bits like finding Happy Families type names for people, and there is a lot of high life, though some of it needs bringing up to date, for I cannot see anyone, even a squirrel in a fancy waistcoat, getting blanc de blanc for £1 a bottle; I call that misleading innocent younger readers. However, the part about Christie's is great fun and has sensible remarks about the crazy differentials between aesthetic and authenticated values. We take it that the adventures of Mr Woodrow Squirrel will continue and that he will use part of his windfall as risk capital in some worthy industry.

Paul Callan must, I suppose, have his fun. It comes in the person of a Welsh corgi who goes up to London to meet his relatives in Buckingham Palace and is nearly run into by a Rolls-Royce whose passenger is—Guess Who. It is presumably written for the Jubilee-saturated under-10s. Maybe there are enough of these kiddywinks about to lap it up. But it may cause a certain nausea among junior republicans.

Mr Callan might have insisted on a better illustrator; the Palace dogs' champagne and cigars party looks like a wolves' night-out after despatching Little Red Riding Hood. By the way, does Mr Callan know that there is a knitting pattern for corgis to go with the knitting pattern of the tea-cozy Queen?

Both these books suffer from being written down for children from a sophisticated adult standpoint. Oggy at Home is a much more straightforward book and all the better for it. The illustrations by Hans Helweg are particularly good; the various characters are given slight indications of what they are supposed to be thinking about without ceasing to be authentic animals.

The story is about the hedgehog Oggy—I find myself quite tempted to read the earlier story about the same endearing hero—and his attempts to educate Tiggy the kitten in the ways of the world. Then there is Jim Starling with his awful jokes, the two guinea pigs, the frog and so on. I could have done with more: for instance Oggy probably did have fleas, but was he pleased to get rid of them—or not? Or didn't the flea powder work? Has Ann Lawrence tried? And has Oggy thought of finding a wife? (After all, every normal school-child knows how hedgehogs make love!) Anyway this is a book that should be deservedly popular in primary school libraries.

Moslem and Sikh

Christopher Schenk

Pavan Is a Sikh. By Sean Lyle.
A. and C. Black £1.75.
Nahda's Family. By Madeleine Blakeley.
A. and C. Black £1.75.

These two books have an important function in disseminating information about different ways of life in our multi-racial society and in dissolving prejudices based on ignorance. They are also a pleasure to handle and look at, and their attractive colour photographs together with their easy-to-read texts, will provoke much discussion, and awaken much interest.

Pavan is a Sikh is about a nine-year-old Sikh boy living in London. The text, which contains a lot of interesting information about Sikh customs and history, is within the reading ability of most nine-year-olds. It includes an intriguing photographic sequence of Pavan's father tying his turban and a fascinating picture of Pavan holding his hair out to full length. But the emphasis is not only on those things that make Pavan different from other British children; the cover photograph shows him happily digging into some fish and chips.

Nahda's Family, which is written from the standpoint of a 12-year-old Moslem girl of Pakistani origins, from the north of England, concentrates more on everyday life. Of the two, it is slightly more difficult to read but is in a more chatty style.

I hope these books will find a place in primary, middle and secondary schools throughout the country, both in areas where there are many Asians and in places where there are few or none at all. The same format could be used with advantage to describe the backgrounds of children not only from other minority groups, but also from small villages or sprawling suburbs or cramped city centres.

Chinks in the cloud

How They Lived in the Stone Age. How They Lived in the Bronze Age. By Stig Hadenius and Birgit Janrup. Lutterworth Press £1.50 each.
The Mycenaeans. By Clarence Greig. China. By Ian A. Morrison.
The Incas. The Aztecs. By Brenda Ralph Lewis.
Ladybird Great Civilizations series 24p each.

Ladybird books long ago hit a winning formula with their simple format and condensed information. Physically durable and popular with their readers, the best have always represented remarkable value for money. Looking at these additions to Ladybird's Great Civilizations series, and the How They Lived additions which come at £1.50 each, it is difficult not to be influenced by this. The Stone Age and The Bronze Age are beautifully produced, but your £1.50 will only get you illustrations in two colours and 30 pages. The Mycenaeans, China, The Aztecs and The Incas, though not glossy, have 50 pages and abundant, full-colour illustrations at roughly one-sixth of the price. Presumably the anticipation of mass sales is the clue to how Ladybird can do it; a calculated gamble on this prophecy probably fulfils it.

Leaving price out of it, both series are worth a second glance. Stig Hadenius and Birgit Janrup have written careful, scholarly accounts, wherever possible describing and illustrating the archaeological evidence for what they say. The trouble with what used to be called prehistory is that so much of it is guesswork. We are lured into its study by so much that is fascinating, only to be lost in a kind of cloud of unknowing. The authors cannot lead us out, and do not attempt to. "Were they toys or magic charms?", they muse on the carved chalk chunks known as the "Folkton Drums". "No one knows." Another caption is equally cautious: "This drawing probably shows a man worshipping the sun." What people wore, what they ate, where they sheltered, what they used for cooking or hunting or fighting is all made plain, but, before the time of the written word, we cannot know what they thought.

Of the Bronze Age in Greece, however, we do have a written record (albeit a later one) in Homer, and his writings are used as a basis for "The Mycenaeans". The text, like the others in this series, is straightforward and concentrates on the personal, the dramatic, the narrative. They are illustrated with characteristic Ladybird realism, vivid but prosaic—all part of the successful formula. Emphasis is placed on the extent to which the extra-European civilizations developed in advance of Europe: the Chinese used printing, the compass, gunpowder and small pox immunisation; the Aztecs excelled in astronomy; the Incas used anaesthetics and successfully practised trepanning and amputation of limbs.

Some of the more equivocal questions which arise are, perhaps necessarily, left open: given that China discovered Europe, not Europe China, why did China allow herself to be overtaken? How did the Aztecs miss the use of the wheel? In fact the questions which linger unanswered are a pointer to the books' achievement; they produce an impulse to re-evaluate our own civilization and see it in more just perspective.

Heather Park

A child's guide to looking at paintings. By Frances Kennet and Terry Measham.
Marshall Cavendish £2.99. 85685 335 6.

I doubt whether many children will be able to cope with the self-consciously chatty style or visually disjointed layout of what is meant to be "A child's guide to looking at painting". It attempts to introduce children to a small but representative selection of works, ranging from cave painting and Persian miniatures to Rembrandt and Matisse, by linking each reproduction to a series of rather patronising questions, suggested projects, and exhortations like "Be yourself . . . everyone in the world reacts differently to pictures".

Although some attempt is made to provide useful visual information, many of the reproductions are too small to perform the services demanded of them by the text. It is all right if you already have some idea of how pointillism works, but it would be quite hopeless to expect a child to start to "experiment with dots" after looking at the detail from Seurat's "Bathers at Asnières" without the aid of a powerful magnifying glass.

A detail from "Guernica", one of the paintings considered.

The only really exhilarating idea put forward is Klee's suggestion to "take a line for a walk" which is far more inspiring than giving children a few dangerously simple diagrams of such virtuoso techniques as linear perspective and chiaroscuro. However, for the primary school teacher, the book might serve as a useful source of ideas for passing a wet afternoon.

Textile lore

Transfer Printing onto Man-made Fibres. By Guy Scott.
Batsford £5.50. 7134 0270 9.

There are remarkably few books available on textile printing which can be said to cover new ground, so this one, dealing only with sublistatic (or transfer) printing, comes as a very welcome injection of information.

In the past, the majority of dyes which could be used without expensive equipment were only suitable for cotton, so the enormous range of synthetic and part-synthetic fabrics could not be printed satisfactorily. Sublistatic printing gives a soft penetration of the fabric and is vastly superior to the hot melt process which only transmits the design onto its surface. Unfortunately, it has not yet been sufficiently developed for use on natural fibres.

The book is well organized, and Mr Scott's explanations are clear and easy to work from. The effects are all he promises and, although the process is fairly complex, it can also be simplified and used by children of primary school age.

Phoebe Latham

Woodpecker Step-by-Step Books. Models. By Judy Allen.
Cloth. Edited by Diana Craig.
Pictures. Edited by Diana Craig.
Presents. Edited by Wendy Boase.
Marshall Cavendish £1.99 each.

Some of the handiwork children produced in the past became heirlooms (samplers, exquisite dolls' clothes) or was put to everyday use (dusters, pinafores for orphans). Today fine work is unfashionable and clothes mass-produced, so busy little fingers decorate jam-jars ("for dried flowers only") or make mural ornaments of clay beads and jute—and this at a period when the mode is for austere interior decoration.

The production of books with tips on how to use toilet-roll tubes and cornflake-packets is becoming quite an industry: here are four more. They are intended for children up to the age of 14 to use without adult help; each consists of 45 pages (including, unusually, the endpapers). Easier projects are presented first, and useful precautionary advice is given (eg. do not cut slits for eyes in a mask while the material is on your face).

There are vividly coloured, largely unshaded, illustrations which owe a good deal to the comic strip. A somewhat baffling feature of the layout is that the top half of each double spread is to be read before the bottom halves of the two pages. Ingenious hints include texturing a marzipan orange on a cheese-grater, and modelling on a blown up balloon which is later burst.

The end products (dainty little posies of felt flowers, "tiny clay cottages to brighten up a bare shelf", the inevitable owl) are grotesque and cute in their cheerful vulgarity rather than imaginative or subtle. It might seem invidious to presume that a child can actually draw, so "pictures" are made by pencilling round tin lids. The carefree extrovert children in the illustrations all wear jeans—and even cut the tops off them when discarded to make wall-hangings with pockets. Several junior school classes and Brownie packs have tried out the suggestions, and doubtless many more will enjoy making a splendid mess and creating these undemanding artifacts.

We need teachers who can remain calm under fire as well as in the classroom.

It's a tall order, we know.

But then, we're not merely offering you a change of schools.

In the Army, you'll teach young recruits and experienced soldiers who wish to qualify as tradesmen.

You'll coach Officers who have to pass examinations for promotion and for entry to the Staff College.

You may well teach abroad, perhaps with British troops, or Gurkhas or locally enlisted soldiers in Hong Kong.

This makes you as important as any of our other Officers.

You'll have the same status, the same opportunities for promotion, the same levels of pay.

We think it only fair, therefore, that you should prove yourself their equal as an Officer.

Six months at Sandhurst will give you the chance.

Although it won't be your main concern, you'll have to prove that you can lead men and, if it comes to the crunch, carry out operational duties.

After Sandhurst and a spell at the RAEC's own training centre, you'll take up your first teaching post.

Your starting salary, depending on your qualifications, will be between £3,136 and £4,641, back dated to the day you joined.

If you decide to leave after three years commissioned service, you'll get a tax-free gratuity of £1,545.

As to your qualifications, the main thing is that you should be a graduate or at least a qualified teacher.

Incidentally, throughout your period of service, you'll be given every opportunity to improve your own professional qualifications, possibly up to post-graduate level.

Assuming you're fit and under 29, you can take a tentative step in our direction by spending three days at our headquarters or a day at any Army Education Centre. Either way, you'll be under no obligation.

Entry normally takes place in January and July and you are advised to apply at least six months in advance.

For further details write to: Captain G. C. Taylor, MA, RAEC, Ministry of Defence (AEd1), Department 22, Empress State Building, Lillie Road, London SW6 1TR.

There will also be ample opportunities for research and other professional activities, both individually and as part of the Department's own programme. This will involve a regular exchange of ideas and information with universities and government bodies. Computer support is already available and powerful new facilities are on order.

Candidates must have a first or second-class honours degree in an appropriate subject, and should preferably have experience in industry or teaching at an advanced level. Appointment will be as Lecturer (£2,890-£4,030) or Senior Lecturer (£4,700-£6,300), according to age, qualifications and experience.

We are seeking an Editor to join in the final stage of work on a major new German/English dictionary being written by a team in Glasgow.

Your specific responsibility will be to read the existing text and ensure that it provides adequate coverage of current American usage.

You will be American by birth, in the age range 25-40, and ideally qualified to degree standard in German. Although the latter is not essential, you will certainly have a formal background in translation, linguistics or lexicography.

A contract will be offered for a period of 12 months with competitive starting salary and fringe benefits being offered.

Rosemary Hartill

Dance this month in London has shown nothing if not variety. Besides Kenneth MacMillan's oppressive full-length costume drama, Mayerling, at Covent Garden, London boroughs have featured two colourful Indian dancers, Britain's first professional all-black modern dance company—Maas Movers, several Graham and Cunningham-based modern dance groups, a French neo-classical modern dance company—Ballet Théâtre Contemporain, and a weird, semi-surrealistic Dutch dance-mime group called Penta.

The most enjoyable of all these was also the least well-attended: Alpana Sengupta, demonstrated Kathak North Indian dance in a vivid Persian-influenced costume in the unlikely surroundings of Hoxton's old music hall. Kathak is distinguished by the subtlety of gesture, the speed and number of the turns and, in particular, the intricate footwork. The word itself means storytelling, and part of the programme included the usual well-loved incidents from Lord Krishna's childhood. Solos from Alpana Sengupta's English husband, Mick Taylor, on sitar, and Manikrao Popatkar on tabla were followed by an exhilarating demonstration in which the dancer and the tabla player exchanged counterpointed spontaneous rhythms, some of them voiced.

The success of this evening underlined the importance to Indian dance of the presence of live musicians, an intimate atmosphere and clear introductions to items. It is something of a tribute to another Indian dancer, Kumari Prassannavadani, that, although she lacked all these, she nevertheless gave an impressive display of the Bharata Natyam Southern Indian style in the cold impersonal spaces of the Commonwealth Institute.

Indian dancing has survived so many centuries that it exudes confidence and vitality, an interesting contrast to the insecurities of the experimental work of many contemporary dance companies. One company in particular that has not yet found its own style and confidence is the Maas Movers. The most interesting item on their current programme is William Louther's Peace Be Still in which the black dancers symbolically come to terms with their race's history of oppression.

The ballet opens with the dancers entering in a formal procession wearing priestlike robes and clapping rhythmically. It is danced to traditional gospel songs and the recital of black poems, and, as it progresses, the robes are discarded and later donned again, indicating (presumably) the process of mature awareness and self-knowledge. This oddly naive and rather confused work nevertheless is danced with a dignity and sincerity that preempts too much criticism.

Programmes of fringe contemporary dance groups do tend to have their longeurs, and this month was no exception. Rosemary Butcher's Dance Company at Hammersmith's Riverside Centre at least avoided the earnest, pseudo-philosophic seriousness that so often besets contemporary dance: instead it explored the actual mechanics of movement—the contrast between stillness and staccato movement, or the way the body's shifting weight carries over into more fluent movement.

On paper this may sound interesting; in the theatre it felt like watching someone rehearse their ABC when you are longing, but longing, for a poem. The final item Theme was distinguished by a series of semi-focused slides running concurrently with the dance, showing bits and pieces of tracksuits, tennis pumps, and the dancers' bodies. These pointless distractions were aparently inteded to "counterpoint the dancers' movement" beneath. "This was a dance", said the programme, "built up using different angles of the body." Ten pounds to anyone who can think of a dance that was not.

The five members of the Extemporary Dance Group are perhaps of a rather higher technical standard who share a variety of dance experience ranging from the Israeli Bat Dor Company to Béjart's Mudra Company. One of their choreographers is Ingegerd Lonnroth, who teaches in the choreography department of the London School of Contemporary Dance. Two of her most promising pieces—Stone Figures and Childs Play—are in the repertoire of her own group, Junction Dance Company.

Stone Figures, supported by an effective score from Barrington Pheloung, builds up an impersonal atmosphere of suspended power and menace, which is then gradually shifted from one group of stone figures to another. Julie Barnsley dances particularly well. Child's Play is quite different—a ballet of three children playing together in a dusty, sunlit attic. Beautiffully observed, it has a freshness and innocence and a real sense of character too. Simon Hick's designs and lighting do it credit.

Over the last fortnight, Sadlers Wells has featured Ballet Théâtre Contemporain from Angers. "Contemporain" the companw may be called, but the clichés it fell back on in moments of stress during its first programme were more often classical than contemporary. The second programme was stronger than the firso, displaying the company to fine advantage in Balanchine's The Four Temperaments and including the old favourite Michel Descombey's Violostries with its shimmering, quite fabulous design and compelling horrifying choreography in which the two dancers seem set to devour one another. One characteristic of this company is that they are not afraid of having fun: pieces like Cooking French and Hopop offer lively entertainment, if not exactly great originality or subtlety.

Finally, there is Mayerling, which should have been, but fails to be, the giant to overshadow them all. In this ballet, which explores the oppressive decadent twilight of the Austro-Hungarian court, and the self-destructive psychosis of the ballet's central figure, Crown Prince Rudolf, Macmillan surely shows himself once again to be a choreographer of relationships, rather than of narrative. The complex and hopelessly melodramatic plot unfolds in a series of sepia-coloured scenes, often dramatically ineffective, padded out and unreal. The deadening emotional effect of so much of this ballet is only pierced by the sheer excitement of the astounding swings and breathtaking falls and catches in the great hysterical and brutal duets which close each act.

Fascinating, brilliant heads

Antony Flew on 'Men of Ideas'

Criticism begins, or should begin, with an appreciation of what is going on, followed by some appraisal of what is right and what is wrong. It is not, or it should not be, nothing but one long sneering and snarling that in the state of Denmark everything is rotten—unless, of course, it so happens that it is. Congratulations, therefore, to the BBC top brass for sponsoring and screening the present series of uninterrupted 40-minute programmes on philosophy and philosophers.

Next, still warmer congratulations to the makers of Men of Ideas for eschewing all televisual gimmickry, allowing the men of ideas to appear themselves, and as such. The obvious admonitory contrast is with the recent J. K. Galbraith blockbuster. There they handed the whole show over to a single supposed superstar, who in fact enjoys no outstanding standing among his fellow professionals in economics, encouraging him to present everything as seen through one somewhat slanted pair of eyes. Great advertising talents too were employed there, rather incongruously, in order to sell to a hopefully gullible public the inadequately tested intellectual products of a famous enemy of advertising.

Again, congratulations on the choice as interviewer of Bryan Magee, who in previous, pre-parliamentary incarnations earned his living both as a television personality and as a philosophy don. No one, I think, could do the job better. Inevitably there have been and will be faults. But the soundness of the basic policy decisions ensures that what is being done is being done just about as well as could be. The great question remains, whether a splendid essay in communication actually is getting across. One can only hope that the BBC is doing some audience research and that it, and then the TES, will publish the findings.

The guest artists in the six programmes so far have been: Sir Isaiah Berlin (on the nature and point of philosophy); Charles Taylor (on Marx); Herbert Marcuse (on Marcuse); William Barrett (on Heidegger and existentialism); Anthony Quinton (on Wittgenstein); and Sir Alfred Ayer (on Logical Positivism).

But there are things that irritated me about them all. The first, for instance, might usefully have made something both of the difference and the connexion between the most general and the more technical senses of the word "philosophy": in the former our philosophy may be that the more sex the better, while in the latter we can speak of the philosophical genius of Zeno of the paradoxes.

Then in the second, and even more the third, Marx was treated to altogether too much reverence. Taylor should have been pressed to specify something in the scientific offering which has not been long since either falsified or else assimilated into the academic mainstream. Nor should anyone be allowed to get away with the suggestion that the authoritarian and socialist Marx, as opposed to the individualist John Stuart Mill, was the great nineteenth-century prophet of liberation. And how was Marcuse admitted into this gallery at all? He is surely not first-rate either as a creative thinker or in actual influence?

Then in the fourth, too, Barrett could have said everything he had to say for Heidegger while leaving more time for the more readable and—in his novels, plays, and protests—more read Sartre. Yet if the occasions for these irritations had been removed, no doubt that would have prepared the grounds for others.

One or two viewers have suggested to me that Men of Ideas could have been as well or better put out on steam radio. How wrong can you get? Would not the philosophical lay audience which these programmes are trying to catch and to hold follow much less much worse if not helped by the moving faces? And what, anyway, is more gripping than such despised "talking heads"?

When sometimes as an undergraduate I arrived too late for a front seat at Berlin's lectures, like others I still found it worth my while to stay to watch what we could scarcely hear. So in the repeats in this series of both Berlin and Quinton I have for a few minutes turned down the sound. I shall try the same again, with the repeat of Ayer, and later similarly fascinating, brilliant heads.

Music and education

Dull in Hull?

Robert Walker on the north-east

"They're dull in Hull", wrote Noel Coward: but there's nothing dull about music-making in Humberside schools. There are many first class school choirs and orchestras on both sides of the mighty river which so effectively divides this new county.

Near Winifred Holtby's mythical "South Riding" (Yorkshire's old East Riding) there is a fine youth orchestra which meets in the historic town of Beverley: it is at present preparing for yet another foreign tour—this time to Norway. The City of Hull youth orchestra has made a big impact through recordings, tours and its local concerts. There is also a thriving new music centre for the city's school children, and a phenomenally high number of them learning instruments. The plethora of school concerts in Hull is testimony to the quality of choral and orchestral work at school level. South of the Humber, too, there are excellent youth orchestras at Scunthorpe and Grimsby, and first rate choral and orchestral work in individual schools, some of which has achieved national recognition.

It is this achievement within the schools themselves, the daily grind of doing music with every class in the schools which so rarely hits the headlines. The wide diversity of opinion as to what should be taught as well as how it should be taught is fostered by a teacher training system which encourages each student to be an individual and to be as innovative as possible. With these thoughts in mind I set out to discover something of the unsung labours of the class-music teacher in Humberside.

Eric Jarvis, head of music at Havelock comprehensive school, kindly demonstrated an example of his weekly routine with a middle ability range class of 12 to 13 year-olds. No member of this class is going to, or even wants to make the London Symphony Orchestra or the Welsh National Opera, but all were involved in making and thinking about sounds in a structured and creative way. After a class performance of a short sound-picture of Grimsby's old Victoriana, attention shifted to creating a sound picture of fog in the manner of John Paynter. String bass, cello, piano, and voices all combined in aleatoric fashion in attempts (some quite musical) to create in sound an experience which exists in another perceptual mode. The lesson time nearly expired, there was just time to do some traditional part singing with boys (growlers and all) on one part and girls on the other.

Commenting on his use of this mixture of avant-garde and tradition Mr Jarvis felt that children readily take to avant-garde sounds but regard them as different from traditional musical sounds (pop or classical). These they tend to accept as "real" music, implying that the former are placed in a different category. He also felt that this was more for the conditioning effect of society than the ability of children in aesthetic discrimination.

With so many different approaches, methods, and philosophies abroad in all subjects, education can be something of a lottery for children taught first one way then another, and not only as they move from one level of school to another. A number of interesting developments aimed at alleviating this in music teaching are in evidence on Humberside. One example is to be seen at Hessle where Ian Haythornwhite, head of music at Hessle high school, has spearheaded through music teaching a most interesting liaison between a secondary school and its "feeder" primary schools. The main objects of this Plowden-type development are, in Mr Haythornwhite's words, to improve the standard of basic musicianship in primary school pupils and general class teachers, to improve the general relationship between the schools, and to provide close links all round.

Two half days of his timetable are spent teaching in the Penshurst and Hessle C of E primary schools, each with an element of in-service work thrown in as class teachers sit in to learn. Other subjects are being developed in the same way and, clearly, this kind of move must be of enormous benefit to children who experience, as a result, some continuity and uniformity of approach.

At Bottesford infants' school I witnessed a rare sight—a specialist musician who teaches nothing but music throughout the entire school. The long-held sacred belief in the importance of the general class teacher for all subjects for this age group was called into question as Margaret Scott allowed me to sit in on two lessons, each typical of her weekly load. The delighted and totally absorbed five and six-year-old faces responding to the crisp, controlled and very rhythmic piano playing, to the clear conducting, the imaginative use of class percussion instruments as simple rhythmic and melodic patterns were explored, and to her trained singing voice gave ample proof of the value of a trained musician working as a specialist with infants.

The same positive and musicianly approach was found in the adjacent Bottesford primary school where highly competent musicians on the staff build on the work done in the "feeder" infants' school. Here large numbers of instrumental players were in evidence and a 70-odd strong choir (almost all the top classes) sang some very difficult songs with a most sophisticated sense of rhythm and a very beautiful soft and fresh tone. Those who think singing is a dying activity in schools should hear children like these in their class music lessons as wel as in the school choir.

Magical mystery tour

Peter Fanning

There are less pleasant ways of spending Saturday afternoons, with a long, grey curtain of rain tipping down, than to pass the time on the Magical Mystery Tour presented recently at Aylward School, Enfield. Three actors, one musician and a dancing master, together with a crowd of young folk—debutants, wiled away the afternoon with terrible tales of snakes and dragons, laughs and limericks, floral dances, lore and legend from around the British Isles.

The stated intention of "educating children in the great wealth of folklore" may have had some success, but it was more the byproduct of a straight "fun happening". Chris Turner leered and rolled his eyes like a tipsy Cornish fisherman and quickly broke down any audience resistance to entering into the spirit of things. Margaret Bell's warty green witch was provided with plenty of scope for shivers and spells, and Josephine Curtis and David Eudon displayed a fine variety of accent and tone as the chair-bound storytellers.

Simplicity of content and staging was one of the charms of this Junior Story Time—though after a while the format of song-tale-limerick-dance began to wear thin. We were not always ready to settle straight down to another good listen after each jolly dance—and participation was generally limited to rousing choruses and baying pantomime "Yes !/No !" trials of strength. It was a rather passive variety show until led by the children of Lavender Junior School the auditorium was finally vacated and armies of youngsters poured onto the stage for a final stroll of "The Lambeth Walk".

But within these limits, scriptwriter Jane Moran and her team of drama teachers produced an entertainment that was elegant, professional and always pleasant to watch. May they produce many more.

Capital radio

Taking the 'set' out of set books

Roy Blatchford

Hullabaloo
Capital Radio
Sundays 5.30 pm

Hullabaloo, Capital Radio's Sunday evening news, music and chat forum for young Londoners, is now devoting a half-hour slot to take the lifeless "set" out of set-books. Programme hostess Maggie Norden came up with the exam special following her phone-ins from pupils with exam problems; the result is a sparkling, inventive, immensely enjoyable and academically respectable look at the works of English literature that have been set for 1978.

Taking us through until June, 22 books are discussed by an impressive array of actors, actresses, directors and authors, their personal insights threaded together with comments from a guest teacher (a different one each week) and Michael Aspel's witty badinage.

Kenny Everett's lively introductory pop jingle "Discover the Superscribes" launches each session: the first on Romeo and Juliet began by putting the play in a modern context with music from West Side Story and Peter Ustinov discussing his own comic parody Romanoff and Juliet.

Eileen Atkins, Judi Dench and Anna Calder-Marshall, all Juliets of the past, commented in turn on the paradox of an essentially young person's role demanding the range of an experienced actress.

In an effort to bring reader and text closer together, Ian McKellan analysed in detail odd lines and words; his relaxed and informed critique avoided any shadow of academic pretence and shone through as the words of the committed professional attempting to share his enthusiasm. His setting of the Prologue, not in Verona, but in fair Belfast certainly offered listeners a rare immediacy and relevance.

The uproarious humour of Lucky Jim, the subject of the second programme, was rendered splendidly infectious in John Cleese's reading from and commentary upon what he took to be some of the best comic set pieces in the twentieth-century novel. Martin Amis suggested what the book had meant to his generation in the fifties, while author Kingsley Amis talked about how he loks at ordinary events from odd angles, blowing up people's idiosyncrasies in order to create humorous narrative.

The Importance of Being Earnest, "a trivial play for serious play", came under examination the following week and, while theatre critic Sheridan Morley related the play to Wilde's life and times, reminding us that it is an epitaph, mirror and documentary to a bygone age, the teacher of the week tried to capture what the author was really on about.

Timothy West and Judi Dench concentrated on the sparkling clarity of the language, its persiflage and how much today's speech lacks Wilde's wit and precision. A reading from John Hurt and recordings of the inimitable Dame Edith Evans, as Lady Bracknell, with John Gielgud added further zest.

While these first three specials were admirably aimed at the CSE and O level pupil, A Midsummer Night's Dream was better suited to the more academic. Diana Rigg, Germaine Greer and Eileen Atkins were less adroit in popularizing their subject: several thoughtful ideas were raised, some of the play's nightmare and madness hinted at, but the overall compilation lacked the customary lively debate and coherence of purpose.

The novels lend themselves as well to radio sound effects as My Family And Other Animals, and Hullabaloo's treatment of the Durrel classic missed few opportunities in bringing the diary of memories vividly alive. The author's own reminiscences of Corfu and the origins of the book were neatly set alongside observations about animal writing from Desmond Morris, while presenter Michael Aspel and the accompanying teacher gave useful hints on approaching a text with so many different characters and episodes to remember.

The essence of the programmes has been to stimulate enjoyment and interest amid the grind of studying. Exam questions are helpfully tackled in the course of the half-hour, returning readers to the text with regenerated enthusiasm. The collage of voices offering different and fascinating viewpoints, punctuated by quotation and timely musical interludes, has produced a winning formula.

The entire project was undertaken with the supervision of ILEA teachers and inspectors, and Maggie Norden and her production staff are to be congratulated on an original and imaginative use of radio which is certain to stir a few thoughts in educational broadcasting and has already won widespread interest from the capital's schools. If plans to put the transmissions on cassette are fulfilled, many of the study-tapes now available will face welcome competition.

Television

Christopher Griffin-Beale

The first two television programmes for the OU's new "Social Work, Community Work and Society" course represent imaginative attempts by producer Richard Argent to extend the medium's contribution to this educational area. One effort is triumphantly successful, the other rather less so.

Michael, the first programme transmitted several weeks ago, is a shortened version of a monologue originally performed at the National Theatre—a tour de force by writer Alan Drury and actor Michael Feast which successfully involves us in the inner pain of an inconspicuous factory storekeeper, cuckolded and deserted by his wife, and hankering obsessively for rigidity in work procedures and moral values.

His monologue is at first dominated by descriptions of his external world, but gradually he reveals more hints of the inner turmoil for which he seeks the reassurance of absolute certainty in the outside world.

Michael's inner state is well complemented by the production's visual style of cold, almost oppressive abstraction.

It is a master-stroke to recognize the monologue's relevance for social work, as a portrait of a potential client whom social workers may need to understand and help, as Professor Paul Halmos explains in his introduction.

The piece carries its own conviction as art: indeed, it is more illuminating than any comparable documentary account could be, fraught as such attempts always are with questions of tact, confidentiality and television's morality in eavesdropping on private grief.

By contrast, the course's second programme, Remember Maria (BBC 2, next Tuesday, 17.45), is an aberration. A group of first-year social work degree students from Bradford perform their own "improvisation", a collage of songs and sketches as their response to the tragedy of Maria Colwell, battered to death by her stepfather after social workers had returned her to her parents from authority care.

The students defend the welfare state and social services against some of the criticisms and disillusion with social work that the case aroused.

Despite Argent's ambitious production, the format still seems better suited to the fringe theatre or campus stage whence it came.

The programme does make some cogent points about society's excessive expectations of social work as "welfare magic", an instant cure for the Bradford course it is per- attitudes will not prevent repetitions of the Colwell case. If one investigates one or two subsequent cases, similar tragedies or averted tragedies, one identifies other issues that are equally fundamental but bear more directly on social workers' practice.

There is, for instance, the conflict social workers can feel between the desire to gain the parents' trust and the need sometimes to act in the child's interest against the parents.

Perhaps such issues of professional practice are outside the brief of this Open University course. But if so the programme's title is misleading, for any memorial to Maria Colwell, if it is not to take her name in vain, must take account of them.

It's Maths
BBC television, Mondays 10.23-10.43 am, repeated Wednesdays 9.38-9.58 am.

It may be significant that the three main mathematics series now available for middle school and lower secondary age children lean over backwards to entertain first and inform second. The days of that uniformly grey and worthily dull series Maths Workshop are a distant memory as one watches Figure It Out (ITV) for the younger end of the range, with zanily dressed presenters and brilliantly realized, colourful set pieces, or Mathshow, arguably the most self-conscious of educational television shows.

Mathshow has been established a couple of years and is said to be effective with the reluctant maths pupil of the 12 to 14 range. The appeal is by Laurel and Hardy out of Monty Python, with elaborate visual gags presenting a basic mathematical idea or concept, liberal use of animated cartoon characters and catchphrases, and jokes, many of them way above the children's heads.

Where does It's Maths stand in relation to these? There are parallels with the two series mentioned: in the presentation (trendily dressed, personable young people as in Blue Peter), chatty approach, and mild slapstick. The situation is that David and dungaree-clad Elaine are sent to clear out the television studio. They find a lot of junk which lends itself to illustrating basic mathematical ideas.

Ideas covered in the first term included place value, graphs, multiplication, angles and symmetry. This term, decimals were the first topic, approached by the method now considered more logical by maths teachers, as an extension of place value rather than the more confusing connexion with fractional parts. Two-dimensional shapes were next, and contained the best exposition of symmetry I have seen at this level. The rest of this term will cover tessellations, sequences and capacity and mass.

Aimed at the average child in the middle school, this is possibly the most successful attempt yet to put over a series of basic mathematical ideas using the best features of traditional instruction with the informality of the modern approach.

Films

Alec Hughes on the BISFA Film Festival

When the British Industrial and Scientific Film Association changed the description of its annual film festival from "industrial" to "sponsored" it deliberately provided an opportunity for sponsors other than industry to enter films. Last year it made a further change by moving the festival from Brighton to London—thus giving many more an opportunity to see some of the 180 or so films which were entered.

Moreover, it gave participants a chance to see all of the films entered because there were no simultaneous screenings and by grouping the screenings into categories it allowed those with a particular interest to concentrate on productions in one area.

This year a further change seems to have been far less successful. As in 1977 all the films entered have been screened in London, again category by category. But audiences have been small. This may be a result of the change in venue from BAFTA's luxury cinema in Piccadilly to Bowater House in Knightsbridge. It may have been due to the severe weather. More likely it is because though the films have been adjudicated the results will not be announced until May in Birmingham when "the best films" will be screened and the winners announced at the traditional end of festival banquet.

What then had the festival to offer education? Today a great deal of attention is being devoted to the role of industry as the creator of the wealth which supports society as a whole. PETT (still known to too few in education) has long been a sponsor of films encouraging young people to think of industry as a possible career and their latest How about engineering for you? (28 minutes) presents James Burke in a role he has made familiar on television using a small panel of experts to discuss with a studio audience some of the variety and interest in engineering.

Two other films attempted the same thing in a different way. Engineering is what you make it (20 minutes) was a nicely structured film sponsored by Coventry and District Employers' Association in which William Woollard both outlined some facets of the subject and conducted short interviews with those who had been successful in taking up apprenticeships. One point emphasized was that there was scope for those with O levels in maths and at least one science subject to advance themselves while others prepared to put in a few years' hard part-time study in their apprentice training could get some interesting jobs.

ICI sponsored Engineering Matters or the Continuing Story of Ogg with a similar objective. Ogg is a cartoon character serving as no more than a soft-sell introducer, the main part of the film again being taken up with interviews with people who are just beginning their engineering careers. It has rightly been said that if one is to recruit to industry the approach must be made early, well before students are committed to a specific line of study. In this connexion the British Steel Corporation's film Character of Steel (19 minutes), aimed (it is rather surprisingly stated) at non-technical customers, mainly architects, uses the novel device of a steel ingot describing its own life story to show how it is converted into a girder to be used in the new kilometre-long shopping centre being consutructed at Milton Keynes. One can see this film doing a useful job with juniors as a way of interesting them in what has always been an exciting location for an industrial film—the hot rolling mill.

I have expressed regret elswhere and will do so here that the COI's television series Living Tomorrow is restricted to overseas distribution. The series presents examples of recent and sometimes novel developments in science and technology. It is precisely a series of examples of this kind which would be extremely useful in education at many levels.

Space permits only brief reference to many other films which have some potential for education. They range from Video Arts Balance Sheet Barrier (a simple and humorous account of the subject), Diversey's Hygiene is a Habit for catering staff, some excellent safety films (of which I would especially note Safety and the Supervisor, Safety in the forest and Millbank's Have a good day dear a rare film about safety in the office), a notable pair by Millbank Films on participation (The more we are together and On the right course), BP's stunning pair on their Alaska pipeline (Pipeline Alaska and The end of the road) and one in which BP was joint sponsor The Shetland Experience about the impact of North Sea Oil on that community.

Finally there is The Overhead Projector. Made by the British Council for use overseas, this film deserves considerable circulation here to improve teaching technique—with its notable contribution from Len Powell showing what variety one can get from a simple device. It is illustrated with a delightful primary school project on Scott's fatal Antartic expedition.
